Mr. FORAKER submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute, intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 11997) granting to the Hawaii Ditch Company, Limited, the right of way over public lands in the Territory of Hawaii; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, and ordered to be printed.

SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS IN TEXAS.

Mr. CULBERSON. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows.

Resolved by the Senate, That the Postmaster-General be, and hereby is, directed to report to the Senate the amount of salary required to be paid to each of the postmasters in the State of Texas named on the memorandum schedule hereto attached, or to their heirs, for service as postmasters in each biennial term specified on such memorandum schedule, in order to make effective sections 473, 474, and 475 of the postal regulations of 1866, and the act of June 12, 1866, section 8, and the act of March 3, 1883, as construed by Postmaster-General Gresham in an order dated June 9, 1883, addressed to Hon. Frank Hatton, First Assistant Postmaster-General, in a declaration as to the intent, meaning, and requirement of said statutes furnished for publication to the press through Chief Clerk Walker on February 16, 1884, and printed as Exhibit A, Senate Executive Document No. 146, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SPOONER. I think it ought to go over until the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go over under the rule.

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose the Senator from Texas has no objection to that course?

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the suggestion of the Senator?

Mr. SPOONER. I said I thought the resolution ought to go over until the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is present.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is a mere formal resolution of inquiry.

Mr. SPOONER. It is merely formal, but it will necessitate, I apprehend, a great deal of labor, and there are propositions involved which are pending as to other States, I understand. Let it go over until to-morrow, and then the chairman of the committee will be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. CULBERSON subsequently said: I ask to have referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads the resolution which I introduced this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). If there be no objection, that reference will be made.

REBECCA J. TAYLOR.

Mr. CARMACK. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it appears that Rebecca J. Taylor, late a clerk in the War Department, holding a position in the classified service, was, by order of the Secretary of War, discharged from her position on the 7th day of June, 1902: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States of America, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be instructed to inquire and report the reasons for such discharge, and whether the same was made in accordance with law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to have consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SCOTT. I object.

Mr. NELSON. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

CONDUITS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask, at the request of the chairman of the committee, that the joint resolution (S. R. 81) to enlarge the use of conduits in the District of Columbia be recommitted to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that the joint resolution (S. R. 81) to enlarge the use of conduits in the District of Columbia be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to know what the resolution is before unanimous consent is given.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator from Texas that the resolution is on the Calendar of the Senate and the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia requested me to have it recommitted for further consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, it is simply to recommit?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. I have no objection in the world to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 259) to establish a light-house and fog-signal station at Semiahmoo Harbor, Gulf of Georgia, Puget Sound, State of Washington.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the committee striking out the clauses beginning on page 77, after line 17, under the heading "Increase of the Navy," and inserting the matter on pages, 79, 80, and 81, relating to increase of the naval establishment.

Mr. HALE. The bill was all concluded yesterday, except as to this amendment, which was passed over, and the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] had the floor upon it to submit some remarks.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, when this bill came from the House of Representatives to the Senate, and was referred to your Committee on Naval Affairs for its consideration and review, it provided for the building of one battle ship, one armored cruiser, and one gunboat in the navy-yards of the United States. It was made mandatory upon the Secretary of the Navy that he should order the building of at least these three vessels in such navy-yards as he might designate. The Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, after duly considering the same, amended the bill so that it leaves it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, if the bids are not satisfactory, or he believes that a combination has been formed among the different shipbuilders, to order one or all of these war vessels to be built in the navy-yards.

A majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs adopted this amendment, and although I differed with them in the committee I do not propose to appeal from the committee to the Senate, for the reason that that committee have patiently, diligently, and intelligently given due consideration and thought to every provision of the bill. Therefore, I acquiesce in the will of the majority as expressed by them in the amendment now pending in the Senate. The bill will, of course, go to a conference committee and there the question will be debated, as are all contested questions between the two Houses of Congress. Indeed, there is hardly an act upon our statute book that has not been the subject of more or less controversy. One House proposes a bill and the other makes an amendment. We discuss it and finally agree upon a measure that we believe is intended to carry out intelligently the object we have in view.

A MATTER OF GOOD POLICY.

But I can not, Mr. President, permit this opportune moment to pass without giving an expression to my views. I believe it is wise, expedient, and good policy on the part of the Government to build at least some of our naval vessels in the navy-yards of the country, and in doing so it is in response in a measure to the demands of the different labor organizations throughout the country on behalf of the mechanics who can do the work in the navy-yards.

So I wish, Mr. President, to trespass for a few minutes upon the time of the Senate to give the reasons why I think, as I have stated, the Secretary of the Navy should designate at least some of the navy-yards where vessels shall be placed under construction.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to ask a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Does the Senator mean to say that this is a demand from labor organizations?

Mr. BACON. We can not hear the Senator on this side.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from California stated as a reason why he advocates this policy that there is a demand on the part of labor unions and mechanics. Does he mean that literally or that there is a request from them?

Mr. PERKINS. I mean that it comes as a request, set forth in a petition. They have presented in a respectful manner a preamble and resolutions showing why it is in the interest of the public service that the navy-yards belonging to the Government—belonging to the people—shall be utilized by our citizens. While I said there is a demand for it, I mean a demand in the sense that it is not only a privilege but it is the right of the humblest citizen of this land to appeal to Congress if he has a grievance, so that grievances may be made known to Congress, for we are but the representatives of the people of this country. This is purely a representative Government, and those of us who are for the time being delegated to represent the people should endeavor not only to carry out their wishes so far as it is practicable, but, as I believe every conscientious representative in Congress does, to cast his vote on the side of that which he believes to be for the good of the general public and for the welfare and prosperity of the whole people.

NAVY-YARDS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The United States has, according to the figures of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts for the year ending June 30, 1901, $79,000,000 invested in the real estate and machinery of our Government navy-yards and naval stations. The amounts so invested increase very greatly from year to year, and with the additions which have been made during the past twelve months now aggregate, according to Admiral Bowles, Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, nearly $100,000,000. Of the navy-yards and naval stations on the Atlantic and Pacific the following have machinery plants of the values given: Portsmouth, $473,896; Boston, $844,925; New York, $1,488,374; League Island, $325,802; Washington, $2,107,198; Norfolk, $863,164; Pensacola, $134,580; Mare Island, $660,146; Puget Sound, $225,122. These yards are completely fitted for the construction of naval vessels, even the least having a machinery plant better suited for this work than some of the private shipyards that have Government contracts for large amounts. Indeed, it is said, and I believe with truth, that some contracts have been given to private yards which had not, when their first contract was secured, machinery sufficient to construct anything much larger than a small coasting vessel. There is apparently no good reason why the facilities provided in the navy-yards of the United States should not be used. It is doubtful if the machinery plants of any of the private shipbuilding concerns are in many ways superior, but, if they are, the facilities of the navy-yards can be brought up to date with a small expenditure of money.

THE YARD AT MARE ISLAND.

Now, let me refer to Mare Island, and in speaking of this navy-yard, located in California, the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, I speak of it of my own personal knowledge, having been familiar with its environment and its equipment for a great many years. In the case of Mare Island, $180,000 will complete the entire new system of steam engineering, of which $80,000 is appropriated in this bill. That sum will give it one of the best systems of shops in the United States for the construction and repair of modern marine machinery. An appropriation of $50,000 for repairs to and improvement of the construction plant, also provided in this bill, will place that department in a state of complete efficiency. The yard at Mare Island is therefore in a condition to construct the hulls and machinery of any class of modern war vessels, and work of this kind, as well as the utilization of the facilities for repairing Government ships, should be the rule and not the exception.

The water facilities at Mare Island are even now better than those of many other yards where battle ships are built. The channel from the sea to the Mare Island Yard has never given rise to accidents to vessels, and it was necessary for the River and Harbor Committee to appropriate only $381,000 to deepen the channel to Port Costa, a large shipping port several miles above the Mare Island Navy-Yard, sufficiently to accommodate the largest battle ship and the deepest draft of merchant vessels entering San Francisco Bay. In January, 1900, the U. S. S. Scindia took soundings from Mare Island Navy-Yard to San Francisco, and found the least depth of water 5¼ fathoms, or 31½ feet. A survey made in April of this year showed a few places of shoaling where the depth at low water was under 30 feet, but the area is very small and the depth of water will be brought everywhere to 30 feet or over at low tide by a little dredging during the summer.

DEPTH OF WATER AT MARE ISLAND.

When the latest survey of the Coast and Geodetic Survey was made, in 1896–97, the least depth of water was found over Pinole Point Bar, which showed 22 feet at low tide, caused by detritus and wash from the mines. But, as stated, the river and harbor appropriation will secure 30 feet at mean low tide. Yet even without this improvement the channel has water enough at high tide, when there is a depth of at least 27½ feet, to admit of the passage of the Olympia, drawing 25 feet 1 inch; the Oregon, drawing 27 feet 1 inch; the Ohio, drawing 25 feet 4 inches; the Charleston, drawing 24 feet 10 inches, or the Boston, drawing 21 feet. These figures are for draft of water of ships complete with armament and with full load of coal and stores.

The facilities for launching vessels at Mare Island Navy-Yard are better than on the Clyde, the channel being 1,400 feet wide against 600 for the British yards. The Galveston, being constructed at the Trigg yards at Richmond, must be launched in a channel only 100 feet wide.

As to docking facilities, Mare Island Navy-Yard has in successful operation one splendid granite basin dry dock capable of receiving an ordinary United States cruiser or United States transport, and has under construction another dry dock, one of the largest in the country, 728 feet long on the floor, 101 feet 11¼ inches width of entrance, 72 feet width of floor, with 30 feet of water on the sill at mean high tide.

There is, therefore, every requisite at Mare Island for constructing the largest modern naval vessels.

In securing data relative to the water facilities at the different navy-yards and private yards where battle ships and other naval vessels are being constructed a surprising state of affairs has been disclosed. It is found that at the navy-yards, where, if authorized, large naval vessels would doubtless be constructed, the depth of water is greater than at the private yards where battle ships are being constructed under contract.

WATER AT OTHER NAVY-YARDS.

The following figures, furnished by the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, show the depth of water available at low tide alongside of the docks and wharves of the navy-yards named:

Portsmouth, 12 to 30 feet along quay wall; 18 feet along the wharf; 40 to 52 feet in channel about 100 feet out.
Boston, 30 feet.
New York, 20 to 30 feet.
League Island, one wharf, 20 feet on one side, 16 feet on other side; another wharf, 22 feet on one side, 20 feet on other side; another wharf, 23 feet on one side, 24 feet on other side.
Washington, 12 to 16 feet. (Boats drawing 18 feet coming in at high tide can lie at one wharf at low tide.)
Norfolk, 17 to 29 feet.
Port Royal, one wharf, 17.9 feet close alongside, 27.8 feet 25 feet out from wharf; another wharf, 14.5 feet close alongside, 25.2 feet 25 feet out from wharf.
Pensacola, one wharf, 22 to 24 feet; another wharf, 13 feet; another wharf, 19 feet.
Mare Island, 25 to 30 feet along quay wall.
Puget Sound, 29 feet. (Wisconsin and Oregon now alongside.)

WATER AT PRIVATE SHIP-YARDS.

The depth of water at mean low tide at different private shipyards where naval vessels are under construction, as given by the Coast and Geodetic Survey, is as follows:

1. Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, Newport News, Va.: Twenty-five feet at docks, which is the greatest depth that can be carried to them.
2. Wm. Cramp & Sons, Philadelphia, Pa.: Twenty-six and one-half feet at outer endof wharves at shipbuilding plant.
3. Union Iron Works, San Francisco, Cal.: The depths on the eastern face of the dock at the Union Iron Works vary from about 8 to 15 feet, the deeper water being at the northern end. Inside the depths are about 14 feet, and are generally maintained by dredging. At the entrance to the hydraulic lift dock the depth is about 17 feet, also maintained by dredging. Off the face of the launching ways there is 6 to 8 feet, and when the draft of the vessel to be launched requires a greater depth dredging is resorted to, and, in addition, the advantage is usually taken of a spring high tide.
4. Bath Iron Works, Bath, Me.: There is a depth of 10 to 25 feet alongside the wharves at Bath; 22 feet can be carried up the river.
5. Lewis Nixon, Elizabeth, N. J.: Fifteen feet can be carried to Elizabethport.
6. Fore River S. & E. Co., Weymouth, Mass.: Nineteen feet can be carried in the river to a point above the yards.
7. Neaffe & Leavy, Philadelphia, Pa.: Twenty-nine feet at outer end of wharf.
8. W. R. Trigg Company, Richmond, Va.: The depth at the wharves at Richmond ranges from 12 to 15 feet; vessels drawing 16 feet ascend the river.
9. Harlan & Hollingsworth Company, Wilmington, Del.: The Christiana River has been improved to 15 feet depth.
10. Maryland Steel Works, Sparrow Point, Md.: Twenty-five feet at the wharves and 21 feet in the dredged channel leading to them.

BIG SHIPS IN SHALLOW WATER.

It will be observed that the Fore River Steamship and Engine Company has available only 19 feet of water, yet this yard is building two first-class armored battle ships, each of 15,000 tons, and each drawing 23 feet 9 inches. Mare Island has from 25 to 30 feet along the quay wall, with at present 22 feet (which will be dredged to 30 feet under appropriations provided for) as the least depth from deep water in San Francisco Bay to Mare Island.

The South Dakota, under construction at the Union Iron Works, is of 13,680 tons, drawing 24 feet 1 inch, yet inside the face of the docks of that yard the depth of water is only 14 feet, while off the launching ways the depth is from 6 to 8 feet, and dredging is necessary when a vessel is to be launched, which even then can be done only at a spring high tide.

The following data, furnished by Admiral H. C. Taylor, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, shows, in connection with the figures giving depth of water, that Mare Island, as its channel now is, is amply able to accommodate the largest vessels of our Navy:

Name of ship.	Draft in salt water; ship complete and with full load.			Draft in salt water, with no coal, ammunition, stores, or armament on board.

COST OF CONSTRUCTION AT NAVY-YARDS.

With modern, up-to-date machinery, with every facility for construction, with an unexcelled dock, and water in plenty, it would appear that the only chance for a failure to construct as cheaply as in private yards exists in the factor of labor. With labor as skillful and as efficiently directed, at the ruling rates of wages, there would seem to be no reason why contract cost should be exceeded, and there is really no reason why it should be exceeded. Twenty years ago or more, when there was more or less politics in the navy-yards, there was danger that inferior workmen would be the rule. But ten years ago the old political system was changed to the merit system, which has since then been rigidly adhered to. The result is that mechanics are employed through an employment board, on whom political influence has no effect, as it is governed by strictly enforced rules, and the rate of wages for mechanics are fixed every six months at the same rate paid by private companies for the same class of labor. So unimpeachable an authority as the Scientific American on this point says:

Popular delusions die hard; and one of the most pernicious and persistent of these is the belief that war-ship construction when done by the Government is poorly done and costs more than it does at private yards. There was a time, it is true, when the navy-yards could not compete with private firms; but that was a time when the yards were overridden by political influence and encumbered with lazy incompetents, who owed their positions to "pull" with the local politicians. Thanks to the trenchant reforms instituted and carried through largely by the efforts of the present Chief Constructor, Rear-Admiral Bowles, our navy-yards have been entirely emancipated from politics, and the organization, plant, discipline, and character of work turned out have been brought up to a standard that is fully equal to that of the best private establishments.

The naval constructors believe, and we fully agree with them, that the time has come when it would be to the nation's advantage to have a certain portion of its ships constructed in Government yards. The plant and the working staff at New York and Boston have been brought up to such a state of efficiency that the largest battle ships could be constructed with economy and great efficiency. The high cost of the Texas, the Maine, and other Government-built ships can not be quoted against this statement, since those ships were constructed before the yards were reorganized and when the plant was old and inefficient. The construction of the ships in Government yards would have a twofold advantage. It would stimulate private builders to exhibit some of that dispatch which has recently been so conspicuously absent (some of our battle ships are a year and a half and our torpedo boats two and a half to three years behind their contract date), and it would be possible to keep the well-trained navy-yard forces continuously at work, instead of having to discharge a large part of them whenever routine work is slack. The practice of building some of the war ships in Government yards is followed to advantage in the leading European navies. We should adopt it here.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW DOES NOT AFFECT COST.

It is alleged that the enforcement of the eight-hour law in navy-yards will render the cost of labor in constructing war vessels considerably greater than when such vessels are built in private yards, where this limitation as to time does not exist. Granting, for the sake of argument, that labor at eight hours is less efficient than at nine or ten hours, I am of the opinion that the difference is more than made up by the fact that it is not necessary in Government yards to earn interest on the capital invested or to pay the very large salaries given to the president and other officers and managers of private yards. The appraised value of the Government navy-yards in 1901 was $80,000,000. Assuming that an equal sum is invested in private yards, construction in the latter would have to earn interest on that sum, which, at 4 per cent, would be $3,200,000 per year. To this must be added the cost of high-salaried officials, who draw from $10,000 to $25,000 per year, and which, in the case of the private yards engaged in building war ships, probably aggregates another million dollars a year. The cost of construction in Government yards, therefore, does not include these two items, for supervision and management are by naval officers already under pay, and who if not employed there would be detailed to other work. Interest on capital invested and the cost of management are therefore saved in Government yards, and, as stated, amount to about $4,200,000 per year. It is not probable that the increased cost of construction incident to the enforcement of the eight-hour law equals this sum, if there is any increase whatever on this account. I do not think, therefore, that the objection to Government construction on the score of the eight-hour law is well taken.

EIGHT-HOUR LABOR AS EFFICIENT AS NINE-HOUR.

But there is no ground for the assertion that a reduction of the hours of labor to eight per day will materially affect the product of that work. On the contrary, there is evidence that as much work is produced on an average in an eight-hour as in a nine-hour day. Factory Inspector Wade, of Massachusetts, in his testimony before the Industrial Commission, says that the effect of reduction of hours in factories has not reduced production or injured manufacturers. It was placed in evidence that the longer hours in Rhode Island did not give manufacturers there an advantage over those of Massachusetts, where the workday is shorter, and that the Southern factories have an advantage in proximity of raw material, not in their longer hours of labor. In all cases where continued muscular and nervous effort are necessary it is recognized that there is a limit beyond which such effort is unprofitable, and it is very doubtful whether in the long run men in the same kind of occupation will perform more work in nine hours than in eight. I do not think, therefore, that the fact that eight hours is the length of a working day at the navy-yards will result in a material difference in the product of a given number of men when compared with that of the same number in private establishments not under the eight-hour law.

WHY SHIPS CAN BE BUILT MORE CHEAPLY IN NAVY-YARDS.

Conceding, for the sake of argument, that the higher rate of wages and the leaves of absence make the cost of labor in navy-yards very much greater than in private yards, and conceding that this excess will be, as Chief Constructor Bowles states, 70 per cent, I think that construction can be more cheaply performed in navy-yards than in private establishments. Constructor Bowles, in a communication printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, makes the cost of a vessel of the Virginia type, when built by contract, as follows:

Labor, two-thirds net cost	$1,600,000
Material, one-third net cost	800,000
General expense, 40 per cent	960,000
Profit, at 10 per cent	336,000
Government inspection	35,000
Cost to Government	3,731,000

In his estimate of cost in a navy-yard Constructor Bowles estimates that labor would cost double that in private yards. But this is hardly fair, as he had already pointed out the fact that, considering higher wages, holidays, and leaves of absence, such cost would be only 70 per cent greater. Adopting his figures, therefore, the cost in a navy-yard would be as follows:

Labor, at contractor's rates	$1,600,000
Add 70 per cent	1,120,000
Material	800,000
Add 10 per cent	80,000
Cost to Government	3,600,000

I think that this is a fair comparison, adopting the data of Constructor Bowles. This shows that the Government would save $131,000 by building in a Government yard.

Constructor Bowles figured that there would be an item of 15 per cent, due to general expense, to be added to the cost of building in the navy-yard; but it seems to me that this should not be so added, as the general expense account would run even if a vessel were not built.

SKILLED FOREMEN AT MARE ISLAND.

It having been doubted that the foremen of navy-yards possess sufficient technical skill to superintend the construction of large naval vessels, I desire to call attention to the fact that there are at present at the Mare Island Navy-Yard eight leading foremen who occupied similar positions at the Union Iron Works yards when the Oregon was being constructed there. And as further evidence of the competency of Mare Island Navy-Yard employees I would state that the Risdon Iron Works, of San Francisco, have made unsuccessful overtures to secure as superintendent for their yard Foreman Ship Fitter W. G. Stevens, of the department of construction and repair, the man who would have most to do with the building of a battle ship were one assigned to the Mare Island Yard. Mr. Stevens was foreman of the Union Iron Works when the Charleston was built.

Another very great advantage of the Mare Island Navy-Yard is its location where it receives the benefits of the great Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers. The salt water from the ocean is here mingled with the flood of fresh water from the interior valleys, and in consequence becomes unfitted to sustain that kind of marine life which is so troublesome and destructive. The teredo and limnoria can not live in the water of the Mare Island Navy-Yard, as is proved by the fact that piles driven at Vallejo thirty years ago are as sound as when placed there, while piles in the salt water at San Francisco and other points exposed to the sea water are rapidly destroyed. At Point Tiburon, Angel Island, and other places near the Golden Gate 75 per cent of the strength of a pile is lost in one year, unless it is sheathed with copper, thoroughly creosoted, or otherwise protected from the ravages of the marine insects.

SOME OF MARE ISLAND'S ADVANTAGES.

At Mare Island this expensive process is unnecessary, and the cost of works on which piling is necessary is less in the first place and the structures require less for repairs. Another advantage of this character of the water is that it destroys all marine growths on ships' bottoms, so that war ships lying there are cleaned without the expense of docking and labor. Seagoing merchant ships often go to the head of San Pablo Bay that the barnacles may be killed by the fresh water, for it is far cheaper to have the growths drop off in the fresh water than to dock the ships and scrape the accumulations from them. And when large steel and iron vessels are waiting for cargoes by reason of slack business they are usually towed to the vicinity of Mare Island and Martinez and anchored, as there the bottoms of the vessels are safe from the accumulation of sea growth vegetation and barnacles.

Still another advantage of the Mare Island Navy-Yard is its climate. Nowhere in the world can a better working climate be found. Practically every day in the year can be utilized in outdoor labor, for the thermometer never goes below 40 degrees or seldom above 85, the average being above 65 for the entire year. Labor under such circumstances is more efficient than when it has to contend with the freezing blasts of winter or the hot, humid atmosphere of an Atlantic coast summer. It is probable that a workman at Mare Island, on this account, will in a year do as much work at eight hours a day as a man in an Eastern yard working nine or ten hours. It is a characteristic of the climate about the great bays of California that it promotes vigor and is free from those changes which detract so much from the efficiency of labor in the winter and summer months of the Atlantic States.

A YARD PERFECTLY EQUIPPED FOR CONSTRUCTION.

We have, then, at the Mare Island Navy-Yard all the conditions for the construction of the largest and best ships required by the Navy, and owing to the absence of profit on construction there is every reason to believe that the material used will be of better quality than that which is used in private yards, where a slight drop below the standard fixed means so much added to the profits of the constructors. It will certainly be far easier to keep material up to standard in navy-yards than in private yards, and as far as the cost of labor is concerned, it is certain that the conditions could be no worse than those reported by the marine superintendent of United States transports at San Francisco, who testified that in the spring of 1899 shipbuilding concerns who were engaged in Government work "put in all kinds of men; sometimes men that probably never had a hammer in their hands were getting $4.50 a day as carpenters."

It is sometimes argued that extra cost would be entailed upon the Government by having ships built at navy-yards by reason of the expense of preparing plans. This is an error. For this work it would make not a dollar's difference to the Government whether the vessels were built in private or Government yards. The plans of every naval vessel are prepared in the Bureau of Construction by the Chief Naval Constructor and his assistant naval constructors, all officers of the United States Navy, assisted by civilian engineers, paid by the Government. On the plans thus prepared bids are solicited, and the private firms securing the contract are compelled to follow the plans thus prepared, and a naval officer is detailed to superintend such construction in order to insure strict compliance with the specifications. The private builder has nothing whatever to do with the preparation of these working plans, which cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, and he pays nothing for the work done on them. It would make no difference, therefore, to the Government as to this item in the cost of a vessel if such vessel should be built in a Government navy-yard.

EUROPEAN POWERS UTILIZE THEIR DOCK YARDS.

The three great European naval powers—England, Germany, and France—utilize to the utmost the Government dockyards for the construction of their ships of war. At the present time England has 28 ships, 12 of which are battle ships and 7 armored cruisers, under construction in its dockyards, against 86 vessels in private yards, of which only 9 are battle ships, and 48 are simply small torpedo-boat destroyers. In France the Government is building 4 battle ships, 11 armored cruisers, and 8 destroyers, a total of 23 vessels, while 22 are being constructed in private yards. The German Government is building 2 battle ships and 1 armored cruiser, with 3 cruisers and gunboats, against 23 vessels under construction in private yards. In the United States 43 vessels are under construction in private yards, and not one in the Government navy-yards. This does not seem to me wise business policy, nor is it making proper use of the facilities furnished by the Government for doing Government work.

It was in evidence before your Committee on Commerce that in the work of dredging harbors alone the Government would save money by investing several millions of dollars in dredgers, even if it did not operate 10 per cent of them, as we should then have a practical way of knowing the actual cost of the dredging work, and thus prevent private companies from forming combinations and taking undue advantage of the Government. It therefore appears with double force that all of the repair work to naval vessels should be done in the navy-yards, and at least one vessel, even if of only small tonnage, should always be on the stocks in each of the navy-yards.

The British naval estimates for 1902–3 show that for dockyard work $14,487,485 is apportioned to new or construction work and only $6,829,660 for repairs. For contract work $23,998,425 is apportioned to construction and only $2,296,750 for repairs. The five great dockyards of Great Britain are utilized to their fullest extent in building new ships.

FOREIGN NATIONS NOW BUILDING WAR SHIPS IN THEIR OWN YARDS.

The special consular reports on the merchant marine of foreign nations state that "nearly all the war ships of Austria-Hungary have been built at home, the majority in the Imperial navy-yard at Pola." The war ships of Denmark "are built exclusively by the Government itself at the royal navy-yards." In France "many war ships are built in Toulon by the French Government on its own docks." A battle ship of 14,865 tons is now under construction at the Brest dockyard and an armored cruiser of 12,550 tons at Toulon. In Germany "the German Government owns three shipbuilding yards—one at Kiel, one at Wilhelmshaven, and one at Danzig—which are exclusively used for the building of vessels for naval purposes." Italy has four national shipyards, in which were constructed during 1897 naval vessels aggregating 17,430 tons. War ships are built in the Government navy-yards at Castellamare di Stabia, and there were under construction there in 1899 the Benedetto Brin, the Agordat, and the Coatit; at the Venice yard, the Ferrucio; at Spezzia the battle ship Regina Margherita, and at the Naples yard the Emmanuele Filiberto was being completed. In the Netherlands armored and protected war vessels are built at the Government docks and at Amsterdam.

Japan has also begun to construct navel vessels in Government yards. In 1890 a second-class cruiser was ordered constructed at each of the Government dockyards at Kura and Yokosuka. Sweden is also building war vessels in its Government yards. Russia has three battle ships and two cruisers in Government yards. It is thus seen that every naval power is making use of its dockyards for the construction of war vessels of every type, and calls upon private builders for only those vessels which it has not facilities to construct. The United States is the only great sea power which fails to utilize its dockyards for new construction.

LOSS TO THE GOVERNMENT FROM CONTRACT WORK.

In our own yards repairing only is done, and by no means all that we have facilities for. A very large proportion of this work has been let out to private firms, to the great loss of the Government, as appears from the reports in House Document No. 537, present session. In the report of Lieutenant-Colonel Chamberlain, which appears in that document, reference is made to the repairs on Government transports at San Francisco, on which work very large sums of money were expended by the Government.

The marine superintendent at that port testified that for this work there was no competition among private bidders after a month, when a combine was clearly formed, which resulted in charging the Government excessive rates. He did not believe that the work was done at a "figure that it would have been done for commercial purposes," and thought that if the Navy Department was also bidding it would have had an effect on the prices charged. Colonel Chamberlain, from the evidence secured, came to the conclusion that the three shipbuilding firms who performed the work "had an understanding among themselves, and that there has been no competition between them." He further says that in most instances the lowest bid was in excess of the amount authorized. It is very clear, upon a careful study of this report, that by reason of a combination among private builders and a lack of competition by Government navy-yards the Government was compelled to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars in excess of a reasonable cost for repairs to transports alone at a single port.

The case of the transport Hancock is one in point. She arrived in port July 29, 1899, and a dispatch was sent to Washington asking authority to have necessary repairs made, whose cost was estimated at $40,000, which would, according to the general superintendent, have placed her temporarily in condition for service. The work was authorized and was done under oral agreement, without competition, and the result was that the repairs to this vessel cost the Government $547,016.28, or half a million dollars more than was estimated to be necessary to make her available for service. Had the repairs been made at the Mare Island Navy-Yard there would doubtless have been a great saving to the Government, as the Navy Department would have had control of the work.

BREAKING UP THE SHIP-BUILDING COMBINES.

As bidding by the navy-yard at Mare Island for repairs to transports would have broken up the combine among San Francisco shipbuilders, and saved hundreds of thousands of dollars to the Government, so opening the navy-yards to new construction would break up the alleged existing combine among the private shipbuilders of the country, and the result would be the saving of millions of dollars a year in the cost of new naval vessels. That a little competition will be extremely beneficial financially is made evident by the effect of the entrance of the Newport News Shipbuilding Company into the field of ship construction. In 1890 the Indiana cost $579 per ton and the Oregon $610, but when the Newport News company began to bid the cost of battle ships was reduced very materially. The new Maine is now being constructed for $404 per ton, and the Wisconsin, by the builders of the Oregon, for $393 per ton. But there is an impression prevailing that the Newport News company has at last entered the combine and that competition is at an end. This indication is found in the following bids for new construction:

Vessel and builder.	Tonnage.	Price.
Pennsylvania, Cramp	14,014	$3,890,000
West Virginia, Newport	14,014	3,885,000
Colorado, Cramp	14,014	3,780,000
Maryland, Newport	14,014	3,375,000
California, Union	14,014	3,800,000
South Dakota, Union	14,014	3,750,000

It will be noted that there is only $5,000 difference in the bids for the Pennsylvania and the West Virginia. There is the same difference in the bids on the Colorado and the Maryland.

OFFICIAL APPROVAL OF THE CONSTRUCTION OF SHIPS IN NAVY-YARDS.

Such uniformity in bids where such very large amounts are involved can hardly occur without an understanding between bidders. To prevent such collusion from being successful it is necessary that there enter the field shipbuilding plants that can not enter a combine. The Government navy-yards are the only ones that can permanently remain independent. That some of them are amply able to build vessels of the largest size and of the highest modern type there is no doubt. The chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, in the Report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1900, says:

> Much has been said both in favor and against the building of vessels in the navy-yards. The progress made in the improvement of yard plants and the ever-increasing need for a permanent skilled force ready for and capable of at all times taking up repairs of any character which the growth in "material" of the Navy entails, makes it desirable that the question should be given careful consideration. There is at the present time, in view of the prosperous condition of the shipbuilding industry and the number of naval vessels building and appropriated for, sufficient work to permit the assignment of a portion of the building work to the Government yards without there being a question of the withdrawal or withholding of necessary support and assistance, through work given out, to a private industry, the maintenance of which in a high state of efficiency is unquestionably of national importance.
> These conditions make it possible to eliminate from the discussion any questions of policy except such as affect economy and efficiency. It has been the history of all the iron and steel navies in existence to-day that the building of the vessels was at first entirely confided to private industry, and that the existence of the nucleus of a steel fleet made it necessary that the governments who were their owners should themselves provide for repairing these vessels; and that, having provided the necessary plant for this purpose, the provision for the maintenance of the equally necessary though vastly more difficult thing to attain, viz, efficient working organization and adequate efficient personnel, forced them to undertake in their navy-yards a portion of the new building work. The extent to which this is being done by the principal naval powers may be seen by the following table:

Nation.	Government yards in which building is carried on.	Battle ships building in Government yards.	Armored cruisers building in Government yards.	Other cruising vessels.
England	5	8	5	3
France	5	3	10	4
Germany	3	3	1	4
Russia	2	3	1	2
Italy	2	1	----------	2

In the case of many of the European nations, for example, Denmark and Holland, maintaining smaller navies, so strongly is this necessity for a permanent efficient navy-yard personnel felt that practically all the naval building work undertaken by them is carried out at their navy-yards. What they have done and are doing is mentioned here solely to emphasize the fact that the unanimous testimony of experience has been and is that the execution of a certain amount of building work at the chief government yards is necessary to the maintenance of such navy-yard staffs as a complete and efficient naval organization requires; and that, whatever disadvantages such a course entails, they are more than compensated for in the end. It is believed that we have reached that stage in a naval development—still considerably behind our national development—which forces upon us serious consideration of this step which other naval powers have found necessary and expedient. At the outset the disadvantages to be labored under will be considerable.

Time and experience will do much toward the alleviation or possibly the entire removal of many of these. While, under existing conditions, in the case of the first vessels built in our navy-yards it may be expected that the cost will not be greatly different from, may even be somewhat greater than for, the same work executed by contract in the private shipyards, the Bureau believes that such a course once entered upon would demonstrate its desirability and practicability in an increased efficiency and economy in naval administration, regarded as a whole, without interference with a judicious policy of such Government encouragement of the shipbuilding industry as will keep the greatest number of establishments in a position to undertake and execute promptly any naval work which may be required.

GOOD WORK CAN BE DONE AT MARE ISLAND.

In the report of the Bureau of Construction and Repair for 1901 appears the following reference to the Mare Island Navy-Yard and its facilities for new construction:

Until about three years ago the extensive changes now in progress had not been contemplated. Within the period named, however, a new dry dock and numerous buildings have been appropriated for, pneumatic appliances have been put into general use, the use of electricity for power purposes greatly extended, gas fuel introduced, sheet metal substituted largely for woodwork aboard ships, etc. Conditions have been altered greatly, therefore.

The plans and improvements submitted are based upon the assumption that too much money has already been expended here to make any change in policy as regards the continued use of the plant and appliances likely, and that it is only a question of time before at least a limited amount of new construction work will be authorized. The general arrangement of slips, docks, and buildings, both of this and other departments, as now contemplated is considered admirably adapted for efficient and economical work.

ADMIRAL BOWLES IN FAVOR OF BUILDING SHIPS IN GOVERNMENT YARDS.

Admiral Bowles, before the House Committee on Naval Affairs, on February 4, 1902, advocated the construction of ships in Government yards. His testimony on this point is as follows:

Mr. WATSON. In view of the fact that the Government employees get fifteen days' leave of absence, and you can not get away from that proposition; and in view of the fact that the Government employees work eight hours a day, and you can not change that; and in view of the fact that you must almost constantly equip the yards with new machinery and improved methods, would you think it advisable to equip the navy-yards to build ships?

Admiral BOWLES. I believe in facing the music.

Mr. WATSON. Which way is the music?

Admiral BOWLES. What do we have navy-yards for? The real purpose in having navy-yards we saw in the Spanish war.

Mr. BUTLER. In facing the music, you have in your mind what you said at first, that it would be necessary to abolish the fifteen days' leave of absence in order to compete with the private yards?

Admiral BOWLES. Yes, sir.

Mr. WATSON. That is music you can not face.

Admiral BOWLES. I believe that we would need some efficient navy-yards. They ought to be equipped fully for doing twenty times as much work as they do to-day. That is what I had in view when I spoke of the New York Navy-Yard.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you decrease wages?

Admiral BOWLES. I would to the extent of paying the wages actually paid by private concerns. Therefore I believe in having a thoroughly equipped navy-yard; and I think the best way to have it is to get them ready for building some ships.

Mr. ROBERTS. Do you give that answer on the theory that we ought to have that kind of a navy-yard, or on the theory that we can build better ships in the navy-yards, or is it on the theory simply because it would give us better navy-yards?

Admiral BOWLES. It is better yards which I aim at. I want to give the service in general—and I say that because I think we have good navy-yards—and therefore I would recommend the building of some ships in them.

Mr. ROBERTS. Even though it cost more?

Admiral BOWLES. Even though it cost more in the beginning.

That good work can be done at Mare Island is made evident by that which has there been done. The Monadnock was in a great measure constructed there, when the facilities in the shape of machinery, etc., were not so complete as at present, and the monitor is as fine a piece of marine work as can be found in the Navy. The Hartford, the old battle ship of Admiral Farragut, was rebuilt at that yard, and the Boston, Alert, Olympia, Bennington, Yorktown, and Marblehead were there practically reconstructed. The tugboats Unadilla and Pawtucket, both steel, were constructed at this yard, and extensive repairs were made to the Adams, Alert, Farragut, Justin, Iowa, Independence, Mohican, Nero, Pensacola, Philadelphia, Ranger, Solace, Thetis, and Wheeling. A portion of the original outfits of the following ships have also been built at this yard: Fox, Davis, Goldsborough, Ohio, Paul Jones, Perry, Preble, Tacoma, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

NO COMPETITION WITH TRANSPORTATION LINES.

The performance of this work at the Mare Island Navy-Yard, and similar work at other yards throughout the country, can in no way affect the business of general transportation lines, which, it has been claimed, object to the plan of utilizing to the fullest extent the facilities existing at the Government yards. Were the Government in competition with private transportation companies for general business the case would be different, for the less cost of repairs would enable it to charge less for freight. But the fact is that the Government does no private business. In its vessels are carried only Government supplies and officials connected with the Government, there being an absolute prohibition of receiving commercial freight or private persons desiring transportation. Only Government business is transacted, and it is in the interest of the taxpayer and for the promotion of the efficiency of the administration of the War and Navy departments that transportation of this kind shall be performed at the least possible cost and that its details shall be under the absolute and immediate control of the responsible officials of the Government.

It is no part of the Government's duty to cripple any of its departments and place us in a dangerous position in case of emergency that private transportation companies may have the privilege of transporting Government stores and officials from one port to another. The Government very properly declines to permit the use of its dry docks to private shipowners excepting in cases of emergency, and then the same rates are charged as those charged by commercial companies. Ours is not a paternal government, and therefore it is not one of its functions to enter into competition with its citizens. We have had too many examples of the evils of caring for private business interests before taking account of public needs to willingly continue the paternal policy any longer.

I will not longer trespass upon the time of the Senate, but will ask permission of the Senate to insert in the RECORD as an appendix to my remarks a concise history of the selection of the present site by Commodore Sloat, who was chairman of the commission which located the Mare Island Navy-Yard in California, and also such action as appears of record which has since been taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

The appendix is as follows:

APPENDIX.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE NAVY-YARD AT MARE ISLAND, CAL.

The following copies of letters and documents give all the information available relative to the establishment of a navy-yard at Mare Island:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 7, 1902.

SIR: Replying to your request of June 5, that you be furnished with a summary of the history of the establishment of the United States navy-yard at Mare Island, Cal., I inclose herewith copy of report No. 14, Thirty-second Congress, first session, submitted by Mr. Gwin, to accompany Senate bill No. 15; copy of letter of Secretary of the Navy to Commodore Joseph A. Smith, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, dated January 15, 1852, and the latter's reply thereto, nominating officers composing commission to choose a site for the California dock; the precept of the Secretary of the Navy, dated January 27, 1852, to these officers, viz, Commodore John D. Sloat, Commander C. Ringgold, Lieut. S. F. Blunt, and Engineer W. P. S. Sanger, constituting them as a board to examine the shores and waters of the bay of San Francisco, in California, for the purpose of selecting a site for a navy-yard and depot, etc.; copy of letter of the Secretary of the Navy of December 13, 1852, to the board, requesting them to state their opinion as to the nature of the tract lately surveyed by the board in California for a site for a navy-yard, known as Mare Island; copy of the act approved August 31, 1852, authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to select a site in the bay of San Francisco, and the report of the board dated December 13, 1852.

I inclose, for your further information, extract from the directory of the city of Vallejo of 1870, concerning the origin of the name "Mare Island."

In Executive Document No. 31, House of Representatives, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, is the letter of the Secretary of the Navy in answer to resolutions of the House of January 21, 1880, calling for "any and all information in possession of his Department relating to the formation of bars and deposits of mud, sand, and gravel at or near Mare Island," etc. The plan attached to the document shows depth of water in front of yard.

Transmitted herewith is a copy of the report of the board of civil engineers, of which W. P. S. Sanger, U. S. N., was senior member, appointed to prepare a plan for the improvement of the navy-yard at Mare Island, California, 1873.

This is all the information concerning the selection of the site and the establishment of the United States navy-yard at Mare Island, California, in possession of the Navy Department.

Very respectfully,

W. H. MOODY, Secretary.

Hon. GEO. C. PERKINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

[Senate Report No. 14, Thirty-second Congress, first session.]

In the Senate of the United States, January 6, 1852—Ordered to be printed—Mr. Gwin submitted the following report (to accompany bill S. 15):

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill to establish a navy-yard and depot on the bay of San Francisco, in California, report:

That they have given the subject that attention which its importance demands, and have been led into a brief review of the policy of the Government in establishing permanent navy-yards for the construction and repair of vessels of war.

The first attempt under our present form of government to commence a naval establishment appears to have been demanded by the necessity of defending our commerce and citizens from the piratical depredations of the Algerine corsairs. An act was passed the 25th of March, 1794, authorizing the building and equipment of six frigates. The passing of this act, as stated by Gen. Henry Knox, then Secretary of War, and in charge of naval affairs, "created an anxious solicitude that this second commencement of a Navy for the United States should be worthy of their national character;" and he stated that "the building of the ships has been directed in several ports of the Union, in order as well to distribute the advantages arising from the operation as to ascertain at what places they can be executed to the greatest advantage." Thus it appears that in the beginning, by way of experiment, if not from the necessity of the case, the public vessels of the Government were constructed in private yards; but this experiment proving ineffectual, none of the vessels having been completed, a committee of the House of Representatives, on the 25th of January, 1797, recommended that a sum of money should be appropriated for the purpose of purchasing and fitting up a naval yard.

Another committee of that House, on the 8th of March, 1798, stated, in reference to constructing public ships in private yards, that "in the view which, on several occasions, this committee have taken of the subject of providing a naval armament, they have not failed to observe the apparently enormous expenses and unaccountable delays which have attended every attempt of this kind;" and in a letter from James McHenry, Secretary of War, to a committee of the House of Representatives, dated the 22d of March, 1798, he stated that "the great delay that has occurred in the present undertaking must always be more or less experienced when heavy ships of war are required to be suddenly built and the Government not previously possessed of the necessary timber and materials. It is certainly an unfit time to look for these and prepare a navy-yard when the ships are required for actual service. It is not to be expected that the large pieces of heavy timber suitable for ships of war will be found at market or accumulated in private magazines for sale when wanted on pressing occasions. Do not these circumstances point to the expediency of a legislative provision commensurate to so important an object?" And again, in a State paper emanating from Benjamin Stoddard, the first Secretary of the Navy, on the 25th of April, 1800, he said:

"In this view of the subject, and believing that it is the truest economy to provide at once permanent yards which shall be the public property, and which will always be worth to the public the money expended thereon, instead of pursuing the system at first adopted, which, with the experience before us, can only be justified on the ground that the ships now ordered are the last to be built by the United States, the Secretary of the Navy has had but little difficulty in making up his opinion that the proper course to be pursued is to make the building yards public property and to commence them on a scale as if they were meant to be permanent." In another communication upon the subject Mr. Stoddard declares that "docks for repairing ships ought to be convenient to the sea, and yet not easily accessible to the enemy." Yards for building the ships, where large quantities of materials would be deposited (the destruction of which would always be an object with an enemy), should be, according to the opinion of Mr. Humphreys, a gentleman of considerable science and experience in naval architecture, "in the vicinity of a commercial city, for the convenience of procuring able workmen," "where the harbor is secure from freshets and stormy weather, out of the reach of an enemy."

These opinions of public officers of high reputation in the infancy of our naval establishment have been verified and confirmed by an experience of upward of fifty years, and have been referred to because of their coincidence with the opinion of this committee as to the advantage of establishing at once a permanent navy-yard and depot on the bay of San Francisco, in California, rather than to depend upon private establishments for the repairs or building of public vessels in that bay. The committee having been so well satisfied of the necessity of having a naval establishment in that distant harbor that the only question presenting itself to their consideration was whether such an establishment should be of a temporary or permanent character; and the authorities herein referred to, together with the settled policy of the Government, are considered entirely conclusive upon this subject.

Whether this subject is considered as regarding simply our naval establishment or in a commercial, fiscal, maritime, or national point of view, it loses none of its intrinsic importance.

As regards the vessels of the Navy cruising upon that once distant and foreign coast, but now our own coast and our own country, none better remember nor have felt more sensibly the want of a port of safety in that region than our gallant naval officers (who have served for many years past upon the voyages and cruises in the Pacific) both for the repair or refitting of their vessels, etc., the recruiting of the health and strength or numbers of their crews. The vessels of war taking their departure from an Atlantic port for a three years' cruise, and making the long voyage around Cape Horn and along the western coast of this continent, arriving in the bay of San Francisco, instead of finding themselves thousands of miles from those means of repair and succor of any kind of which they might stand in need, will, when this yard shall have been established, find themselves at home, where every repair, aid, and assistance can be obtained.

But the importance of this establishment to our Navy would be most felt should this country unfortunately be involved in war with a powerful maritime nation or nations, because in that event should numerous and heavy fleets cut off or harass our cruisers from the Atlantic ports for the protection of our interests in the Pacific we should then possess the means and ability to construct and fit out war steamers and other vessels of war from the bay of San Francisco capable, with the aid of the whalers' crews, to drive every hostile sail from that coast.

In a commercial and fiscal point of view, the establishment of this navy-yard and depot and the defenses necessary to sustain it, adding, as it will not fail to do, to the security of the commercial marine and the numerous vessels engaged in the whale fisheries in the Pacific, the trade and commerce of San Francisco and other ports in California and Oregon will derive additional importance and encouragement and consequent extension which will, no doubt, be sensibly felt in the revenues from the customs in those ports, and the benefits to be derived from this source by the Government will greatly overbalance any expenditure that may be made for this object.

In an extending maritime and national aspect, the creation of a strong naval establishment in the bay of San Francisco, in the opinion of the committee, is of very great importance to this country. When the immense value of the whale fisheries and trade to the western coast of the two Americas, to China and other countries of Asia, and the islands of the Pacific and Indian oceans, and the daily increasing trade and commerce of California and Oregon, are all considered, it must be confessed that this Government is under the strongest obligations to lose no time in providing the most ample means for the future security of all these interests, which interests belong almost entirely to the commercial cities of the Atlantic coast and the enterprising mariners from New England engaged in the whale fisheries; while California, enjoying only incidental advantages from these operations of trade and commerce, and the establishment of these resources and means of defense upon her soil and in her waters, will have the honor of affording upon her territory a firm resting place for the fulcrum of the lever of that power of this great country, which is hereafter to maintain its maritime rights and peace upon the vast expanse of the Pacific and Indian oceans. For all great national purposes, whether defensive or offensive, or in a state of war, or protective of our commerce and the rights of our citizens on the ocean in time of peace, if the right arm of our power is to be put forth from the Atlantic and Gulf coast, the left hand of that power must necessarily be extended from the Pacific coast.

In reference to the interests enumerated above, it is only necessary to take a retrospective view of the extent of the commerce and navigation of those regions from the ports of the Atlantic in past years, and of the vast increase of this commerce and navigation since the important acquisition of California by the United States. The direct trade of California, concentrating almost exclusively in the harbor of San Francisco, for the year ending June 30, 1851, as appears by an official statement from the register of the Treasury, employed the number of vessels and amount of tonnage as follows: American vessels entered, 379, of 115,779 tons; cleared, 815 vessels, of 293,435 tons; foreign vessels entered, 482, of 142,349 tons; cleared, 515 vessels, of 136,735 tons. Although this exhibit by no means embraces the whole extent of this trade, it is sufficient to show the large amount of commerce which has grown up in that State in so short a period of time, and the immense extent to which this commerce is destined to arrive in the future, judging from the unparalleled rapidity with which it has progressed heretofore. In addition to this direct trade, there must be taken into account the numerous fleets of whaling vessels from the New England States frequenting the Pacific Ocean, with a tonnage averaging for the last six years 181,651 tons, and employing a large force of the ablest seamen, and returning to the Atlantic ports freighted with their rich cargoes of sperm oil. And in further addition must be enumerated all the shipping and capital engaged in the extensive and valuable trade and commerce with China and other countries of Asia, and with the eastern archipelago and other islands in the Pacific and Indian oceans.

To realize the importance of the proposed naval establishment in the bay of San Francisco it is necessary to consider the value and extent of the interests enumerated above and the liability, in the event of a war with one or more powerful maritime nations, as before stated, to the injury or ruin of those interests. This would be prevented by providing in time the means of constructing and repairing public ships in a secure harbor on the Pacific coast, defended by sufficient fortifications against any attack that could be made against it either by land or water.

The national interests, confirmed policy, and present naval exigencies of the country manifestly requiring the establishment of a permanent navy-yard and depot on the bay of San Francisco, in California, the committee have examined the bill referred to them for that object with much care, and believe that it is well calculated to effect that purpose; but the committee having taken a full view of this subject, believe that such an establishment as is proposed by this bill will not be complete without the addition of a basin and railway, which in connection with a floating dry dock authorized and provided for by the act of the 3d of March, 1851, will be an indispensable appendage to the navy-yard and depot to insure the prompt and efficient repair and refitting of the public vessels, and to possess which facilities in the bay of San Francisco is of great importance to the Government.

The committee therefore recommend that provision also be made for these objects, in order that the board of officers authorized by the bill may in their selection of the site for the navy-yard and depot also embrace in their view and arrangements all of these necessary objects. In the event of a war these appendages to the navy-yard would be indispensably necessary to prepare vessels for sea on a short notice or to repair with promptitude vessels that may be disabled in conflict. It may also be remarked that the floating dry dock now being constructed would be of little utility without the addition of the basin and railway. Indeed, the navy-yard or dock itself would be deprived of a most important feature, now considered as an integral and essential part of every building and repairing navy-yard and absolutely necessary for the use of the Navy, whether in a state of war or peace.

The committee have deemed it their duty to propose this additional provision, from several important considerations. In the first place, it will secure economy in the construction of these several objects by having them constructed simultaneously or in reference to each other, avoiding alterations and disadvantageous expenditures and loss of time in a separate and subsequent arrangement and construction of them. In the second place, a provision for them all at this time will give the Government the advantage of the practical experience and scientific knowledge of the board of officers that may be appointed to establish the site for the navy-yard, to make such selection of a site as may be best adapted to all these indispensable objects together, and, in the third place, all can be conveniently arranged with reference to the same system of police and be brought within the same plan of defense.

In the consideration of this subject the committee have been so deeply impressed with the importance of the duties to be performed by the board of officers, to be composed of officers of the Navy and United States engineers, and to be appointed for this service, and the necessity for an elaborate and thorough examination and survey of the bay of San Francisco and its adjacent grounds, to enable them to make an impartial selection upon professional and scientific principles, and with reference solely to the perfect adaptation of the site and grounds for the purposes intended and to the permanent interests of the Government, that they have considered it proper to recommend a provision for such additional compensation and traveling expenses to these officers as not only to meet the heavy additional personal expenses to which they will be subjected in the performance of this duty, but to secure the services of the officers in every way qualified for this delicate and highly important and responsible duty.

The committee therefore report the bill to the Senate with an amendment providing for these objects, and recommend its passage with the amendment.

[Thirty-second Congress, first session.]

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to select a site for a navy-yard and naval depot in the bay of San Francisco, in California, or neighboring waters, either by purchase or by reservation of public lands, as the case may be, and shall cause the same to be surveyed and a plat thereof to be recorded in proper form; and when such selection shall have been made, the said Secretary shall make such arrangements as may be necessary to establish a navy-yard and naval depot upon the most approved and economical plan on the site so obtained, and cause to be erected a foundry, machine shop, blacksmith's shop, boiler shop, engine house, pattern shop, carpenter shop, and storehouse, and for the purpose of carrying this section into effect the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, directed to appoint some suitable naval officer or engineer to receive and superintend the construction of the floating dry dock in California.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 15, 1852.

SIR: You will be pleased to name three naval officers and one engineer to compose a commission to choose a site for the California dock.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILL A. GRAHAM.

Commodore JOSEPH SMITH,
Chief of Bureau of Navy-Yards and Docks.

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS,
January 16, 1852.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, and in compliance with your direction to name three naval officers and one engineer to compose a commission to choose a site for the California dock, I respectfully nominate Commodore John D. Sloat, Commander C. Ringgold, Lieut. Simon F. Blunt, and Engineer William P. S. Sanger, as suitable and proper persons to compose that commission.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

JOS. SMITH.

Hon. WILL A. GRAHAM,
Secretary of the Navy.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 27, 1852.

GENTLEMEN: You are hereby constituted and appointed a board to examine the shores and waters of the bay of San Francisco, in California, for the purpose of selecting a site for a navy-yard and depot, including a naval hospital and marine barracks.

You will prepare yourself for this duty and proceed to San Francisco in the steamer which is to sail about the last of March next from New York for Chagres or Nicaragua.

You will make a requisition upon the Bureau of Ordnance and Hydrography for such instruments as you deem necessary for this service.

You are authorized to visit and examine for your information and satisfaction the floating dry dock at the navy-yard at Philadelphia and also of the working of the floating dry dock in New York City.

You are authorized to appoint a draftsman, who will also act as secretary to the board, and you will be allowed three chainmen, who, in addition to their appropriate duties, shall perform such other service as the board may direct.

On your arrival at San Francisco, you will call on the commanding naval officer present to furnish for the service you are directed to perform such facilities and assistance as you may require and he may have under his control.

If there should be no suitable vessel in the squadron for your use you will procure, on the best terms practicable, a small sailing or other vessel, and other necessary appointments which the squadron can not furnish for the efficient protection of the work confided to you, and in case of the death or total disability of any member of the board the commandant of the Pacific squadron will appoint a successor. When ready you will proceed to explore thoroughly and minutely the waters bordering on and the shores of said bay, noting and recording as you proceed, the various advantages and disadvantages of both land and water for the location of a navy-yard and depot for the purposes above indicated.

After having examined these to your satisfaction, you will confer and consult upon the result of your labor, and select the site best suited to the various purposes of a navy-yard, hospital, and barracks, and in making up your judgments you will keep in view for attainment, as far as may be, the following prominent objects, viz:

First. Its security from attacks by an enemy, and its facilities and economy for defense.

Second. Its security from violent winds and sea, and the accommodation for safe anchorage in its adjacent waters.

Third. Its adaptation to the construction of a permanent stone dock, and for the working of a sectional floating dry dock, in connection with a basin and railway, if a basin and railway be practicable in those waters.

Fourth. The facilities for procuring, and the accommodations for boarding mechanics, and workmen of various classes.

Fifth. The facilities afforded for procuring most readily materials, supplies, and stores of all kinds.

Sixth. Its fitness and adaptation for the construction of piers, wharves, launching ships, and building ways, storehouses for the reception and keeping of various stores, marine hospital and barracks, workshops of the different kinds required for the building and repairs of sailing and steam vessels of the Navy, and such dwellings for the officers attached to the yard as you may deem necessary.

Before you shall decide upon the point and location of the depot, in support of your opinion upon the advantages and practicability of its military defense, you will call to your assistance and confer with Capt. Henry William Halleck or other engineer of the United States Army, who will be instructed to give the board his experience and advice upon this very important subject.

After you shall have agreed and decided upon the best location available you will make a plan of the ground, showing the different elevations, with the topography, as well as may be, the plan to embrace the water near the shore, giving the soundings and description of the ground under water, with the height of the water during freshets and their duration; also the rise and fall of the tides, and the course and velocity of the currents. Upon the plan you will work out on a convenient scale what in your judgment are the best locations for a floating dock, basin, and railway (if basin and railway are practicable there), stone dock, piers and wharves, ship house and launching ship, storehouses, foundry, machine and boiler shops, blacksmiths' shop, joiners' shop, offices and dwellings for officers, Navy hospital, and marine barracks.

You will ascertain as far as practicable, from observation and inquiry, what is the effect, if the evil exists to any extent, of the marine worm in those waters. You will inform yourselves, as far as practicable, of the kinds and qualities of materials for the construction of fabrics of masonry and wood, and of the best means of procuring them. You will preserve all your original minutes, observations, and drawings, and when the duty assigned you shall be completed, which the Department trusts will not occasion your absence over four or five months, you will return to the city of Washington and make your report to the Department, with the necessary plans and descriptions of what you have done in the premises.

You will ascertain whether the site you may select be the property of the United States or of individuals, and, if the latter, inquire into the title and probable cost, and you are at liberty to enter into contract for a tract of land sufficient for the purposes aforesaid (if the title of the place selected be not in the United States), subject to the ratification of this Department.

These instructions you will regard as confidential, and will proceed in their execution and report your proceedings thereon with all practicable dispatch.

Wishing you health and success in this important service and a safe return, I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILL A. GRAHAM.

Commodore JOHN D. SLOAT,
Commander C. RINGGOLD,
Lieut. S. F. BLUNT, and
W. P. S. SANGER,
Washington, D. C.

Unfortunately the report of the Sloat board can not be found among the records of the Navy Department, but Hon. R. W. Thompson, Secretary of the Navy, in a communication to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, January 27, 1880, said:

"I have the honor to state that in the year 1852 a board of naval officers was appointed to examine the bay of San Francisco and adjacent waters and to select a site for a navy-yard. This board made a very careful examination of the points supposed to possess the requisite advantages for a naval station, and, after mature deliberation, came to a conclusion, agreeing with the report of a former board composed of Army and Navy officers, that Mare Island was the most eligible and advantageous position that could be found in the waters of the bay of San Francisco and its adjacent waters for naval purposes, and they reported accordingly."

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, December 13, 1852.

GENTLEMEN: You will oblige me by stating your opinion as to the nature of the tract lately surveyed by you in California for a site for a navy-yard, known as Mare Island. I desire to have your estimate of its value, with all its appendages and advantages, regarding depth of water, harbors, etc. Your opinion may be formed without reference to the question of title, of which I could not expect you to express an official judgment, my object being to obtain some guide in the estimate of its value for land and water, with a view to a contract of purchase.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN P. KENNEDY.

Commodore J. D. SLOAT, U. S. N., Washington, D. C.
Commander W. S. OGDEN, U. S. N., Washington, D. C.
Lieut. S. F. BLUNT, U. S. N., Washington, D. C.
Engineer W. S. SANGER, U. S. N., Washington, D. C.

WASHINGTON, December 13, 1852.

Hon. JOHN P. KENNEDY,
Secretary of the Navy.

SIR: In answer to your letter of this date asking "your (our) opinion as to the value of the tract lately surveyed by you (us) in California for a site for a navy-yard, known as Mare Island," and desiring to have "your (our) estimate of its value, with all its appendages and advantages regarding depth of water, harbor, etc.," and stating that "your (our) opinion may be formed without reference to the question of title, of which I (you) could not expect you (us) to express an official judgment, my (your) object being to obtain some guide in the estimate of its value for land and water, with a view to a contract of purchase," we have the honor to state the island, including the tule opposite Vallejo, contains about 900 acres, in addition to a large tract of tule extending toward Napa and Sonoma. There is ample space for all the buildings required for a navy-yard, with good anchorage for ships of war; and, as stated in our report of the 6th ultimo, we consider it the most eligible location near San Francisco.

In reference to the value of this site for the purposes of a naval establishment combining, as it does, all the advantages stated in our report with respect to depth of water and general commodiousness as a harbor we are of the opinion, though we are aware that a large portion of it, say, nearly three-fourths, was recently purchased for a much less sum, that it would not perhaps be overestimated for the contemplated uses of the United States at $100,000.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

JOHN D. SLOAT.
WM. S. OGDEN, Commander, U. S. N.
SIMON FRASER BLUNT, SR., U. S. N.
W. P. S. SANGER.

UNITED STATES BRIG MAJOR EASTLAND, Mare Island Straits, July 13, 1852.

SIR: I have the honor to inform the Department that the board appointed to select a site for a navy-yard and depot in the bay of San Francisco have, after a careful examination, come to the conclusion that Mare Island is by far the most eligible location for that purpose in these waters.

The board will present their plan of the survey and detailed report on their return to Washington, according to instructions.

The island is held in 80 shares by five persons. The district attorney is now examining the titles. If found good, the board will endeavor to ascertain for what amount it can be purchased, and conclude an arrangement, if thought advisable, subject to the approval of the Department.

The board hope to be able to leave for Washington on the 1st of August.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

JOHN D. SLOAT,
Senior Officer of the Board.

Hon. WILLIAM A. GRAHAM,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington City.

NEW YORK CITY, August 31, 1852.

SIR: I have the honor to inform the Department of the arrival this day in New York City, of the board for the establishment of the location of the navy depot and dry dock at or near San Francisco, Cal.

In consideration of the debilitating nature of the journey from California, I have thought it advisable to delay the meeting of the board at Washington City, until the 1st day of October, by which time the duplicate charts and drawing instruments will have arrived which left San Francisco in the steamer of the 15th August.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Hon. JOHN P. KENNEDY,

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., October 1, 1852.

SIR: The instructions to the board appointed to select a site for a navy-yard in the Bay of San Francisco require topographical drawings of the several points examined; and as the Department is in haste for the report of the board, it is necessary, in order to expedite the work, that a topographical draftsman be employed. I therefore respectfully ask authority to employ a suitable person for that purpose.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN D. SLOAT,
Senior Officer of the Board.

Hon. JOHN P. KENNEDY,
Secretary of the Navy.

WASHINGTON, December 9, 1852.

Hon. JOHN P. KENNEDY, Secretary of the Navy.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith the report in triplicate (with maps and plans referred to therein) of the board appointed to select a site for a navy-yard and depot, etc., at or near San Francisco.

The board respectfully awaits your further disposition.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN D. SLOAT,
Senior Officer of the Board.

This letter, together with the report in triplicate and maps and plans referred to, did not reach the files of the Department until the 26th of February, 1853, having been retained by the Secretary of the Navy pending a negotiation with Wm. H. Aspinwall, of New York, for the purchase of Mare Island. See letter of Secretary of Navy to Mr. Aspinwall of date the 26th of February, 1853.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, February 2, 1853.

SIR: I have the honor to submit to your consideration the accompanying papers, relating to the title of Mare Island, in the Bay of San Francisco, in California, for your opinion.

In pursuance of the duty assigned to me by the act of the last session of Congress making appropriations for the naval service and directing the Department to select and purchase a site for a navy-yard in California, my attention has been drawn to Mare Island, which has been recommended to the Department by a board of officers appointed to examine and report upon the various localities in California adapted to the proposed establishment. I have consequently entered into negotiations with those who claim to be the owners of this island with a view to its purchase.

The papers now submitted to you will show the nature of the contract I have made and the character of the title offered to the Government. These papers are—

1. A contract dated December 10, 1852, with William H. Aspinwall, wherein he, as representative of the proprietors, has contracted on his own part and on the part of all other parties interested in the ownership of Mare Island or claiming any interest in the same, to convey by good and sufficient deed or deeds the entire and absolute fee simple in that tract of land to the United States.

2. A deed executed by said Aspinwall and others and offered in pursuance of this contract.

3. Copies of certain deeds on record in California purporting to show the validity of the title of said Aspinwall and the parties he represents.

4. Some memoranda of an adverse title to said land set up by Henry Sanford.

5. A note of the opinion of Messrs. Halleck, Peachy, and Billings, of California, expressing their views of the validity of the title offered by Aspinwall and his associates.

6. The opinion of George W. Cooley, esq., the law agent in California, of the United States, which opinion has been communicated at my request, inviting him to inform this Department what questions of fact and law are proper to be investigated with a view to ascertain the character of the title to this land. Mr. Cooley's large experience in the investigation of California land titles, derived from his professional duties there, enables him to point out very fully the proper course of inquiry for the ascertainment of this title, and his opinion will greatly facilitate your examination of the subject.

7. A printed pamphlet containing the opinion of the board of commissioners of California land claims in several cases which presented many cases of interest in the investigation of titles, and which opinions are referred to in the communication of Mr. Cooley.

This Department has plats or charts describing Mare Island and its appendages, furnished by the board of officers on their recent inspection and survey, with other papers illustrative of the subject, which will be submitted to your examination if you should find it necessary to refer to them.

The Department is desirous to obtain your opinion, with a view to its final determination on the contract, and in pursuance of the duty imposed upon it by the (an omission in the letter).

I beg leave to call your attention—

First, to the consideration of the character and validity of the title offered by Mr. Aspinwall in pursuance of his contract with the Department.

Second, to the consideration of the conflicting title set up by Mr. Sanford.

Third, to the question whether, supposing the title offered by Mr. Aspinwall to be doubtful, the title rests in any other party or whether it belongs to the United States.

You will oblige me by stating what doubts or difficulties you may perceive to exist in the title offered by Mr. Aspinwall, the points of litigation to which it might possibly give rise, and the embarrassments it might present to the Government if this Department should take possession on any supposed title resting in the Government without purchasing the conflicting claims of Mr. Aspinwall and the other owners whom he represents. This point may be material to the decision of the Department in concluding any negotiations for the purchase.

I have the honor to be, with the most respectful consideration, your obedient servant,

JOHN P. KENNEDY.

Hon. I. I. CRITTENDEN,
Attorney-General United States.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, February 26, 1853.

WILLIAM H. ASPINWALL, Esq.,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have just received a communication from the Attorney-General on the subject of the title to Mare Island, upon a reference of that question made to him in pursuance of the resolution of Congress of 1841. The opinion is not yet filed in this Department, having been retained to be copied.

It contains a recommendation which this Department considers sufficient to justify the completion of the contract heretofore made with you, and I therefore now write to you to say that upon the execution of another bond by you for a faithful compliance with the terms of the contract made by me, by the letter of the 10th of December, 1852, with you, I shall be ready to close the negotiation and accept the deed.

The bond heretofore sent by you and dated the 27th of December refers to the first deed executed by you. But as that deed was rejected and another one of the 4th of January executed, the bond must be made to conform. I must also require that the new bond to be executed shall refer more particularly to the above-mentioned contract of the 10th of December, and stipulate for an exact observance of that contract, and that that contract shall be considered the groundwork and guide in the interpretation of the obligations of the bond and the purport or intent of the deed. I will prepare another bond in conformity with my views and send it forward to you for execution immediately.

When it is returned to this Department and the deed shall be approved, a requisition will be made to pay the purchase money.

The exact amount of the purchase money will be as estimated by the Auditor, and the amount of fee claimed by Mr. Bates will be deducted and held by the Government until that question is determined or some other satisfactory arrangement made.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN P. KENNEDY.

In 1873 a board of civil engineers, appointed by authority of the Secretary of the Navy, consisting of W. P. S. Sanger, Calvin Brown, and F. A. Stratton, made an examination for the purpose of revising the plan of the yard, and in the course of a long and exhaustive report, said:

"By reference to the accompanying plan A it will be seen from the diagram showing the range of tides that the height of the highest known tide was 2.20 feet below the point established as the height of the dock coping, and with such a tide there would be 30.30 feet of water on the gate sill of the dock. The lowest known low tide was 12.06 feet below the coping, and that at such a tide there would be 20.47 feet of water on the sill. The average height of all the 'greater high tides' observed is 4.50 feet below the coping, and gives 28 feet of water on the sill. The average of all the 'lesser high tides' is 5.42 feet below coping, and gives 27.08 feet of water on the sill. The average of the 'greater low tides' is 9.16 feet below coping, and gives 23.34 feet of water on the sill. The average of the 'lesser low tides' is 11.14 feet below coping, and gives 21.35 feet of water on the sill; and the average of all low tides is 10.10 feet below coping, and gives 22.40 feet of water on the gate sill.

"From this examination it is evident that at all times of high tide there will be at least 2 feet of water on the gate sill in excess of the depth at high water on the miter sills of the stone dry docks at the other navy-yards; that vessels drawing 28 feet may be docked at the highest 'greater high tides;' vessels drawing 27 feet at an average of all high tides, and vessels drawing 26.50 feet at an average of the 'lesser high tides.' It is also evident that at an average low tide a vessel drawing 22 feet of water could pass over the sill. * * * The stone dry dock now being constructed will be of ample capacity to receive vessels of the largest class, the depth of water on the gate sill at high tide being 27.5 feet, or 2.5 feet more than any of the other stone docks in the country. This dock, as before stated, with the floating dock, basin, and railways, will furnish the necessary facilities for building and repairing 25 vessels of the largest class at the same time, thus placing Mare Island in this respect on a footing equal or superior to the largest dockyard in Europe.

"At the northern end of the yard we have located a shallow basin in connection with 12 railways for laying vessels on shore when not needed for active service. These railways will store 24 ships of the largest class, or a proportionally larger number of smaller size, in safe position, where they may be kept clean and always in condition to be put afloat at a few hours' notice and be ready for active service."

The Commission on Navy-Yards reported on December 1, 1883, to the Secretary of the Navy in regard to the advantages of the Mare Island Navy-Yard as follows:

"Its approaches may be successfully defended against the attacks of a powerful enemy; it is far enough removed from the sea to be beyond the reach of guns of the longest range, or any possibility of being captured by a coup de main, and yet not so far as to make it difficult of access. The adjacent harbor is good and perfectly secure in all weathers. The channel is deep and never obstructed by ice. The climate is even and salubrious the year round, and suitable to outdoor work. The soil and characteristics of the site are such that dry docks or basins may be constructed at reasonable cost. The Napa discharges at every ebb tide an amount of fresh water which proves fatal to the teredo, a marine worm destructive of the bottoms of wooden ships and pilings of wharves or other woodwork placed in salt water.

"The yard is convenient to the railroad communications, which center on the opposite shore of Napa Straits and on the shores of the Straits of Karquines, about a mile distant. The convenient supply of fine timber for wooden shipbuilding is practically inexhaustible. The depth of water abreast the yard front averages 28 feet at mean low tide, and abreast Commission Rock, an obstruction that can be easily removed at a small expense, 21 feet. Mean rise and fall of tide, 6 feet 5 inches. On the principal water front there are from 24 to 23 feet at mean low water, and this depth may be easily and cheaply maintained by occasional dredging. There is no difficulty in our heaviest draft ships going up to the quay wall at any stage of the tide."

MARE ISLAND—WHY SO CALLED.

Frequent inquiry has been made as to the origin of the name "Mare Island," and most generally the explanation thereof has been faulty. It is a matter of local interest that may find an appropriate place in a directory of Vallejo, with which the island is so intimately connected. The name had its origin in this way: In early days the only ferryboat on the waters near Vallejo and Benicia was a rude one, made chiefly of oil barrels obtained from whaling ships and propelled by sails. These barrels were secured together by beams and planking, and it was divided into compartments for the accommodation of cattle, to the transportation of which it was chiefly devoted.

One day, while this boat was coming from Martinez to Benicia, a sudden squall overtook it, and the craft pitched fearfully. The animals (chiefly horses) became restive, and some of them were thrown with such force against the weak partition that they broke through it. The boat was upset and the living cargo thrown into the bay. Some of the live stock were drowned and some managed to reach either shore by swimming. One of the horses (an old white mare, owned and much prized by General Vallejo) succeeded in effecting a landing on the island and was rescued there a few days after by the general, who thereupon called the place "Isla de la Yegua," or Mare Island. This is the absolute fact and the whole history of the above-named Mare Island.

POSITION, SIZE, AND SHAPE OF THE ISLAND.

The position of Mare Island is admirably adapted for the purposes of a naval station. Vessels of the largest class can come close up to the shore, while there is sufficient anchorage in the stream between the island and the Vallejo shore to accommodate all the fleets in the world. Mare Island is oblong in shape with a circumference of about 10 miles, and contains about 3,000 acres. The surface is generally uneven, though there are no very high hills. The soil is fertile, and all the grain and hay used upon the island for Government animals is grown upon it.

GOVERNMENT POSSESSION.

The Government of the United States took formal possession of Mare Island in 1854, through that noble and illustrious naval hero, Admiral David G. Farragut, then a commander in the Navy, who came here with a single war vessel and commenced operations. At first a modest building or two sufficed for the wants of the Government. Now more than a score of stately structures are seen, and 1,600 mechanics and laborers are barely adequate to supply the wants of the service.

Admiral Farragut remained in command about four years, and it was under his supervision that most of the buildings were projected and put up. The plans were drawn and the yard laid out by W. P. Sanger, civil engineer of the Navy Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. The bill was all completed last night, but there are one or two other amendments. I offer an amendment to come in on page 38. It is only a recast of a provision which was put into the bill yesterday. I ask that it may be substituted for that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and what the Secretary is about to read will be substituted for the amendment agreed to on yesterday.

The SECRETARY. On page 38, at the end of line 7, it is proposed to insert:

Office building for commandant, $35,000; quarters for commandant, $12,000; quarters for civil engineer, $7,500; landing and wharves, $50,000; grading and drainage, $10,000; workshop (to cost $80,000), $50,000; storehouse and storekeeper's office, $50,000.

UNDER THE BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT.

Equipment building (to cost $125,000), $62,500.

UNDER THE BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING.

Machine shop (to cost $174,000), $80,000; foundry and copper shop (to cost $118,000), $60,000; power house (to cost $50,000), $25,000.

UNDER THE BUREAU OF ORDNANCE.

Workshop, $40,300.

UNDER THE BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

Ship-fitters' shop, with mold loft and furnace (to cost $200,000), $50,000; power house and fuel storage (to cost $80,000), $35,000; machine shop (to cost $120,000), $40,000; joiners' shop (to cost $120,000), $30,000; foundry (to cost $75,000), $20,000.

In all, $657,300.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that what has been read is a substitute for the amendment agreed to on yesterday?

Mr. HALE. It is. It is merely a recasting. It does not change the appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. There are a few verbal amendments. On page 2, line 23, after the word "of," strike out the words "naval cadets" and insert "midshipmen." That should be done all through the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 2, line 25, after the word "as," strike out the word "cadets" and insert "midshipmen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question in connection with the change of designation from naval cadets to midshipmen and in connection with what appears to me to be a change in the appointment of the cadets. As the law now stands it is provided that as soon after the 5th of March as practicable the Secretary of the Navy shall notify the member of Congress representing a district in which a vacancy at the Academy exists, and the member of Congress shall make a nomination. If he fails, then the Secretary of the Navy may appoint.

Now, it appears to me that in this amendment, beginning at the last line of page 66 and going onto page 67, you commit the appointment of all the midshipmen directly to the President and eliminate entirely the member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. SPOONER. To what page does the Senator from Texas refer?

Mr. BAILEY. Pages 66 and 67.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator that, just as it is now, the appointments are all finally to be made by the President.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand they are, but is it the understanding now on the part of the committee that the two appointments for the State at large will be made by the President upon the recommendation of the Senators from the State?

Mr. HALE. The President will have nothing whatever to do with them. It will be just as it is in the Army. The language is the same. They will be selected by the Senators and will appear for examination, and if they pass, will then be appointed by the President.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will observe the language, it says:

They shall be appointed by the President and shall, with the exception of the 15 midshipmen appointed from the United States at large, be actual residents of the Congressional or Territorial districts, or of the District of Columbia, or of the States respectively from which they are appointed.

There is the appointment by the President. There is not anything in the proposed law, as there is in the present law, which requires their designation by the member. The only inquiry I desire to make is this: Is it the understanding of the committee that this simply changes the designation and provides for more appointments, but all are to be made as at present?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly. The Senator need have no apprehension whatever about that.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the law now provide that they shall be appointed on the recommendation of the member of Congress?

Mr. HALE. It is more a regulation than anything else. It has always been done.

Mr. SPOONER. That is now the law?

Mr. HALE. It is in the law.

Mr. SPOONER. After this passes it will not be in the law. I do not care about it——

Mr. HALE. The committee has no doubt whatever about it. It has followed exactly the same rule followed in regard to the Army.

Mr. SPOONER. But the Senator from Texas is absolutely right about it. If it is in the law that it shall be done upon the recommendation of the member of Congress, and if this bill passes, it eliminates that element.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator any fear that the President will interfere with what is understood and what is the law and what has been the invariable practice?

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to say that my whole object was to have it stated on the floor of the Senate what was the purpose. Now, I will say for the information of the Senator that a man who had examined this bill no longer than yesterday told me that the other construction was the one which was going to be placed upon it.

Mr. HALE. There is no question about it.

Mr. BAILEY. I wanted it understood in the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I am glad the Senator asked the question. There is no question about its practical operation—not the least.

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose not.

Mr. HALE. On page 47, line 4, after the word "and," I move to strike out "naval cadets" and insert "midshipmen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 66, line 16, after the word "of," I move to strike out "cadets" and insert "midshipmen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 66, line 21, after the word "the," I move to strike out "cadets" and insert "midshipmen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 59, line 21, I move, after the word "yards," to insert "and the bureau," so as to conform to the other provision.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 12, after line 20, I move to insert what I send to the desk. It is not a new appropriation. It is simply a matter of bookkeeping.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, after line 20, it is proposed to insert:

That the unexpended balance remaining in the Treasury on June 30, 1902, from the appropriation "Ordnance and ordnance stores, 1900," or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby reappropriated and made available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, for expenditure in fulfillment of contracts heretofore made and properly chargeable to said appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Wisconsin has an amendment which he desires to offer.

Mr. SPOONER. I move to amend the bill on page 8, line 9, after the word "select," by inserting the words "on the Great Lakes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "select" in line 9, page 8, it is proposed to insert the words "on the Great Lakes;" so as to read:

Naval training station: The Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to appoint a board, composed of naval officers, whose duty it shall be to select on the Great Lakes a suitable site for an additional naval training station, and, having selected such site, etc.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senator in charge of the bill to allow the same words to go back into the caption.

Mr. HALE. Of course, there should be added the words "Great Lakes" in the caption. It is not essential, but it is better to put in the amendment. Then it will read, "Naval training station, Great Lakes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the vote by which those words were stricken from the bill will be reconsidered.

Mr. HALE. They were in the bill originally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They were in the bill originally.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 43, after line 21, it is proposed to insert the following:

Public Works, Bureau of Equipment: For construction of a fireproof building for Bureau of Equipment at Pensacola Navy-Yard, $100,000.

Mr. HALE. Is that estimated for in the regular estimates?

Mr. MALLORY. It is estimated for in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. HALE. Then I do not object.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move, on page 43, line 22, to change the total appropriation from $392,200 to $492,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I also have another amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 19, on page 54, insert the following:

Navy-yard at Pensacola, Fla.: One bookkeeper, at $1,200; one shipping clerk, at $1,000; in all $2,200.

Mr. HALE. Is that estimated for?

Mr. MALLORY. It also is estimated for.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move, on page 54, line 21, to change the total appropriation from $103,932.28 to $106,132.28.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maine and the Senate to the fact that, while it is true that the appointment of cadets to the Military Academy at West Point is made under a provision exactly the same as the one under this bill, with the necessary change of phraseology to make it relate to the Military Academy rather than to the Naval Academy, still, in the general law, as it appears in the Revised Statutes, there is a different provision relating to the appointment of naval cadets from that which covers the appointment of military cadets.

It was because I knew of the existence of that different provision that I ventured to call the attention of the Senator to it. There was some question here, and I simply desire to put into the RECORD that provision of the law in reference to notifying members, so that it shall be understood that the members of the House and the Senators are to be notified in the same way. I refer to section 1514 of the Revised Statutes, and it reads in this way:

SEC. 1514. The Secretary of the Navy shall, as soon after the 5th of March in each year as possible, notify, in writing, each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives of any vacancy that may exist in his district. The nomination of a candidate to fill said vacancy shall be made upon the recommendation of the Member or Delegate, if such recommendation is made by the 1st day of July of that year; but if it is not made by that time, the Secretary of the Navy shall fill the vacancy. The candidate allowed for the District of Columbia and all the candidates appointed at large shall be selected by the President.

I simply desire that it shall go into the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. I am glad the Senator has called attention to it.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

LONDON DOCK CHARGES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1792) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to navigation of vessels, bills of lading, and to certain obligations, duties, and rights in connection with the carriage of property."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. I ask the Senator from Minnesota to give way until I can have disposed of the motion to reconsider the Choctaw treaty.

Mr. NELSON. That will involve a long debate.

Mr. STEWART. Will I never get it disposed of?

Mr. NELSON. I have been waiting——

Mr. STEWART. The Department is very anxious for it. It is tied up here.

Mr. NELSON. I have been waiting for three months, and I finally got a unanimous-consent agreement——

Mr. STEWART. The Department has been waiting for a year to settle this matter; for several years, in fact. It has got this agreement, and the matter can not be acted upon until the motion to reconsider the bill is disposed of.

Mr. NELSON. I do not feel that I can yield at this time.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow morning, immediately after the routine morning business, the motion to reconsider the Choctaw treaty may be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is already a unanimous-consent agreement for to-morrow morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. I shall object to any more unanimous-consent agreements if they are going to interfere with business.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that the unanimous-consent agreement was given subject to other matters of which notice had been given. I had given notice that I should move to proceed to the consideration of a bill which went over yesterday, and the notice remains on the Calendar at the present time. I do not want to lose any rights, although I do not wish to obstruct the consideration of the pending bill this morning. I want it to be remembered, however, that there was a condition attached to the unanimous-consent agreement, and that applied to the bill I have in charge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and is open to amendment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is there an amendment pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read. It has not been read heretofore.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will at the same time read the proposed amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, after the word "charge," it is proposed to insert:

Or any clause, covenant, or agreement whereby there is imposed on any such merchandise or property, or on the consignee or consignees thereof, the payment of any port.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the amendment to the existing law as proposed by this bill is printed in italics. There are only two slight amendments to the bill. The reason why the matter was printed in italics is simply to show the change in existing law. It is not an amendment reported by the committee. There are only two amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It appears here as an amendment. It ought not to have been printed in that way.

Mr. NELSON. There are only two amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will complete its reading.

The Secretary read as follows:

Or any clause, covenant, or agreement whereby there is imposed on any such merchandise or property, or on the consignee or consignee s thereof, the payment of any port, harbor, dock, landing, lifting, weighing, or sorting charges, or charges of any kind for the discharge or delivery thereof, the payment of which is by the laws, statutes, or customs of the foreign country or countries to which such merchandise or property shall be transported imposed on such manager, agent, master, or owner, or any persons or agencies other than the consignee or consignees thereof, or which charges are contrary to said laws, statutes, or customs; or any clause, covenant, or agreement whereby are impaired the rights or privileges granted to the consignee or consignees of such merchandise or property by the laws, statutes, or customs of the foreign country or countries to which such merchandise or property shall be transported. And.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is part of the bill as reported?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is part of the bill; so the Senator from Minnesota says.

Mr. NELSON. There are only two amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota say that this is the bill as reported from the committee, and that the words in italics do not constitute a proposed amendment?

Mr. NELSON. No; there are two amendments. I will call the attention of the Senate to them. After the word "landing," in line 9, page 2, the committee propose to amend the bill by inserting the words "lifting, weighing." The report of the committee shows that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Senator will be obliged to propose the amendment now.

Mr. NELSON. Those are the amendments recommended by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator propose the amendment?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; I propose the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 9, page 2, after the word "landing," it is proposed to insert the words "lifting, weighing."

Mr. NELSON. That is an amendment recommended by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was improperly printed. It appears as if the entire matter in the bill in italics is a proposed amendment. It is not, the Senator says. It is the law as it would read if this bill should pass, with some trivial amendments which the Senator from Minnesota now proposes.

Mr. NELSON. The matter was printed in italics for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to the change in the existing law—the amendment of the Harter law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. The next amendment of the committee is after the word "thereof" in line 15, to insert:

Or which charges are contrary to said laws, statutes, or customs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "thereof" in line 15, page 2, it is proposed to insert:

Or which charges are contrary to said laws, statutes, or customs.

Mr. NELSON. The report of the committee shows these are the amendments recommended by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. Those are all the committee amendments.

The bill as amended by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole upon the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act entitled "An act relating to navigation of vessels, bills of lading, and to certain obligations, duties, and rights in connection with the carriage of property," approved February 13, 1893, be, and it is hereby, amended so as to read as follows: "That it shall not be lawful for the manager, agent, master, or owner of any vessel transporting merchandise or property from or between ports of the United States and foreign ports to insert in any bill of lading or shipping document any clause, covenant, or agreement whereby it, he, or they shall be relieved from liability from loss or damage arising from negligence, fault, or failure in proper loading, stowage, custody, care, or proper delivery of any and all lawful merchandise or property committed to its or their charge, or any clause, covenant, or agreement whereby there is imposed on any such merchandise or property, or on the consignee or consignees thereof, the payment of any port, harbor, dock, landing, lifting, weighing, or sorting charges, or charges of any kind for the discharge or delivery thereof, the payment of which is by the laws, statutes, or customs of the foreign country or countries to which such merchandise or property shall be transported imposed on such manager, agent, master, or owner, or any persons or agencies other than the consignee or consignees thereof, or which charges are contrary to said laws, statutes, or customs; or any clause, covenant, or agreement whereby are impaired the rights or privileges granted to the consignee or consignees of such merchandise or property by the laws, statutes, or customs of the foreign country or countries to which such merchandise or property shall be transported. And any and all words or clauses of such import inserted in bills of lading or shipping receipts shall be null and void and of no effect."

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after the 1st day of July, 1902.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any further amendments to the bill as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, of course the fundamental trouble with this bill is, as its terms show, that it proposes that men who ought to know their own business shall not make contracts. It proposes that if shippers having in view the long-established usages of docks and the unlading of vessels in London make a contract that in addition to their freight money—which is entirely a matter between them, and which is a matter of competition—there shall be put on what are known as the London dock charges, charges that have come about from the natural growth of business, such a contract shall be illegal. Years and generations ago, when business was small and ships were limited in their capacity, they went into the Thames and unloaded over the side and lighters took the cargo and carried it off, and the whole thing was under the charge and control of the dock men.

As ships increased in size, as cargoes were multifarious in their kind, and as the shipowner found that in great ships of 5,000, 6,000, and 8,000 tons there would be 500 or 600 different articles from different shippers, it was found impossible to unload over the side. Therefore it was settled that certain dock charges to cover everything should be paid for by shippers instead of the old charges paid direct to lighters and dock men. This in the course of the growth of business was acceded to and agreed upon in 1888, and it has been the law and the rule of business ever since.

Now, the millers and the lumbermen are not suffering. It has not occurred to them that they are suffering. They have increased their exportations almost double in the twelve years. They have monopolized and do to-day the English market for flour. Against seventeen thousand million pounds of flour only 178,000 pounds are furnished by the rest of the world; and in the twelve years the price paid for freight by millers has come down from 18 cents a hundred pounds to 9 cents. There is no oppression here. There is nobody who has suffered. All this has worked without friction admirably. The old dock business has gone out and the whole thing is done upon the docks; the transfer is made there; it is all managed through the companies, and all charged to the shipper instead of its going over the side to the lighter and the dock men. This has gone on for twelve years, and as to how it has worked, after the investigation that he made of the subject, our ambassador, Mr. Choate, says:

> The ultimate question must be whether the dock charges imposed by the London clause are really unjust to the shipper, and on that question an acquiescence of twelve years by the shippers, without forcing it to the attention of the Government, has a decided bearing.

It ought, Mr. President, to have a decided bearing.

It has been said that this is exceptional and applies only to London. The same kind of a provision, which has become necessary by crowded docks and immense vessels transporting various kinds of cargo, is used at Liverpool, Glasgow, Southampton, Hull, and Bristol. It is not called the London clause, because it is the usage at the other towns. Some of the largest companies of the world, like the great Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, have, as a matter of convenience, a clause in all of their charters similar to this. So it is not a discrimination that is made against America in favor of the rest of the world, but it has all been done in the interest of the convenient transaction of business.

Now, Mr. President, there is another thing to be said about this measure. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] struck at an underlying weakness. If these men should get this bill passed it would not do them the least good. They can not ship their flour and their lumber without a trade with the ship companies, and it has got to be a mutual trade. The Senator from North Dakota inquired of the Senator in charge of the bill whether if this was done it could not all be put into the freight, and the answer was, undoubtedly it could, but that they would take their chances on competition. There is the same competition now. Any company that chooses may make its freight rates so low that the dock charges, included and added to the freight, amount only to what another company will agree to do it for.

But the Senator says that all the companies have combined and they will not make any change; that they insist upon this dock clause being added. If we take it off and declare that men shall not make a contract, shall not agree to pay dock charges, the same companies who now combine, as the Senator says, will agree that their freight charges shall include the dock charges, and this attempt will be futile, just as it is always futile to attempt to legislate against men in their own business making their own contracts.

See how the bill closes:

> And any and all words or clauses of such import inserted in bills of lading or shipping receipts shall be null and void and of no effect.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that that is exactly the form of legislation which was adopted in the case of the Harter act, where they had been in the habit of putting clauses in bills of lading exonerating the shipowners from liability for storage or in carrying cargo.

Mr. HALE. Oh! That involves public policy affecting the liabilities of common carriers. That is another question. Here it is only a question of what in a particular contract a man agrees to pay. This does not involve the liability of a common carrier. That has been settled at common law. Clauses which are in constraint of trade have been decided to be against good legislation. But this is simply providing that if men make a contract as to what they shall pay a common carrier, put it into the agreement, and get their goods transported on the contract they have signed, those words shall be considered of no effect.

Mr. President, the Senate is not in the habit of passing such legislation. I am inclined to think that in this contest between the steamship companies and the millers and lumbermen the millers and the lumbermen can take care of themselves without the intervention of an ironclad act which says that they are children, and they can not make a contract that they shall be obliged to stand by. From what I know of the millers and the lumbermen in the contest between them and the men who must transport their articles, I would risk it to them that without any ironclad law like the one here proposed they will be able to take care of their interests.

The Senator says we will take the chances of competition on the freight. Mr. President, there is the same competition now. One company says we will transport this for 9 pence a hundred pounds with the dock charges added, another company says we will transport it for 8 pence with the dock charges added, and another says for 7 pence with the dock charges added. The answer the Senator makes is that there is a combination and that they all agree upon everything. They will do just the same thing afterwards. You can not pass legislation which will be of any avail of that kind that shall control and interfere with and cripple the rights of men to make contracts with each other touching different kinds of business that come nigh to each other and are connected. If the Senator should get his bill through without a word of objection, in six months the friends who are behind him in this matter and whom he is representing would find that they had not saved one penny.

Mr. NELSON. I will say to the Senator that we will take our chances on that.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly the Senator will take his chances on it, and while he says he will take his chances he is asking the Senate to pass an anomalous bill declaring that if men make a contract for the transportation of their goods to London the words in the contract that they have put in and signed shall not be of effect, but shall be illegal.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if he is correct that the shipowners will immediately add it on the freight charges and no benefit will go to the mill men and the lumber men, how could it hurt the shipowners in any way? How could it do them any damage if that be true?

Mr. HALE. I do not want to see the statute book deformed by any such legislation, and it is not the kind of legislation the Senator from Arkansas generally believes in.

Mr. BERRY. I will say to the Senator from Maine that the reasons which actuate him are not the reasons which actuate the shipowners. They care nothing about the statute book being deformed by the passage of such a measure, but they are opposing it.

The Senator says that this is not the kind of legislation I generally believe in. The difficulty here is that all the shipowners who ship goods from Atlantic seaports have united and combined to force this clause into the bill of lading or freight bill.

The Senator says that the millers and the lumbermen are able to take care of themselves. They have no remedy whatever. They can not ship their goods unless they insert the clause in the bill of lading. They are forced to do it. There are no other ships to carry their goods and they are absolutely helpless.

Now, one word more, and then I shall not interrupt the Senator further. He says that the shipowners will add it to the freight bill. Mr. President, I heard all the testimony; I heard the agents of the shipowners representing all of the combine, and my judgment is that they will not add it to the freight bill, because the parties who do business in London will not permit them to do it. If they do it, then these goods will go to Liverpool and other ports and will not go to London. The shipowners know that they can not add it to the freight bill.

Mr. HALE. It will make the aggregate only just what it is now. The Senator at my left, as I said, struck at the underlying weakness of this measure. You can not control and regulate—I repeat what he said Saturday—this competition, and you can not control and regulate a combination between the shipowners among themselves as to freight or as to dock charges.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will permit one word, I do not know whether we can control these combinations or not. The Senator says we can not control them. There are a great many people in this country who think that every effort ought to be made to control these combines and to regulate them. Whether the Government will be able to do so or whether they are stronger than the Government is a question that will be settled further on.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, this does not touch the question of controlling great trusts. There is no trust here; nobody pretends that there is. It is only a case where men are engaged in a common business. They come together; and certain matters of freight at certain ports, no matter who does the freighting, are just as surely fixed as the hours of the tide that comes and goes. It is not a trust; it is only an agreement between men engaged in the same business.

Now, what strikes one with wonder is that if this abnormal kind of a law, a deformity, as I call it, in the law, is such a pressure, such a grievance, how is it that it has been borne, Mr. Choate says for twelve years, and two years more make fourteen years?

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Maine allow me?

Mr. HALE. I never have heard of anybody suffering——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. There has been a protest made against this practice all the time. Repeated efforts have been made by negotiation time and again to get the vessel owners to abstain from it.

Mr. HALE. That is right.

Mr. NELSON. Perhaps in the last Congress no effort was made to secure legislative relief.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. NELSON. Before that the effort was made. They have been struggling against it all the time. I do not want the Senator to convey the impression that they have consented to it in silence.

Mr. HALE. They have tried to remedy it in a business way, just as business men do remedy such things. If I am buying an article from a retail dealer, I do not ask the law to come in and declare that I shall not pay what I agreed I would pay. If I think he is asking too much, I try to get him to cut it down.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator a question upon a straight legal proposition. As I understand his argument, it is that there will be the same charges in some other form and that the shippers will get no particular remedy from this legislation. Conceding that, does the Senator state as a legal proposition that Congress, having supervision over interstate and foreign commerce, can not under that general power prohibit a clause in a bill of lading of the kind complained of here, and provide, further, that if it does appear in a bill of lading in the future it shall be disregarded?

Mr. HALE. I doubt very much whether Congress has the power.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say for myself that I think it has the power.

Mr. HALE. I doubt very much whether Congress has the power to declare that a contract shall be void which relates not to the liability of a common carrier, not to his obligation, but to the rate at which goods are to be transported. I have very great doubt whether Congress or the courts can interfere to sustain that contention.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course goods are billed by carriers of this country to foreign ports. Have we not a right to control our own carriers? What was the Harter Act but an exercise of that power?

Mr. HALE. That act went very far, of course. My point is that the bill provides not for a regulation, but that where a contract is made between the parties it shall be unlawful.

Mr. SPOONER. But has not Congress the power in the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce to render unlawful a contract which is against public policy, which is discriminative?

Mr. HALE. It may be so, as——

Mr. SPOONER. Is it not true that these London dock charges interfere with the commerce of this country?

Mr. HALE. Not by any means.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there not a discrimination——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. SPOONER. One moment, please. Is it not practically a discrimination against this country?

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. SPOONER. In other words, to what other countries does it apply?

Mr. HALE. To all Canada. There is just the same regulation exactly. It is not a discrimination.

Mr. BERRY. The North Atlantic ports.

Mr. HALE. All North America.

Mr. BERRY. No; all North Atlantic ports.

Mr. NELSON. No, not North America; not the Gulf ports.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the objection to this bill?

Mr. HALE. The question might be asked with reference to any bill, no matter how absurd its provisions should be, What is the practical objection to it? The practical objection is that the usage has been going on without trouble; that it has adapted freight to modern requirements; that as ships have grown large and cargoes have become more assorted this London dock charge has proved to be the best way of increasing the facilities for ships entering the Thames and discharging and getting away. The voyage is done more quickly under this arrangement, which is the compounding of certain dock charges.

Mr. SPOONER. If my friend will permit me, the ships have grown large in other countries as well as in this country. Cargoes have become assorted in other countries as well as in this country. Why is it that this London dock charge, which is exacted from the United States, is not exacted of ships' cargoes from France, Russia, and other countries?

Mr. HALE. I have stated that in one of the largest companies in the world, the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, they have the same kind of a clause for the convenience of shippers.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. And it not only applies to London, but, as I have said, it applies to these other towns—Liverpool, Glasgow, Southampton, Hull, and Bristol.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business. It has passed the hour of 2 o'clock.

Mr. NELSON. I ask the consent of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], if there is no one ready to speak on the unfinished business, to let us go on and finish this bill.

Mr. CLAY. I understand that the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] desires to proceed.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] has the floor and desires to go on.

Mr. HALE. It will come up to-morrow morning.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President, an isthmian canal to unite the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans has been the dream of science and the hope of commerce ever since Spain, by her discoveries, gave the American Continent to the world and to civilization. That which has been written about the project, beginning at a period very soon after Spanish occupation of the Isthmus, represents in exploration, research, experiment, scientific study, and lucid exposition almost as much of human effort as that which has been done in the immediate direction of its accomplishment, and in value to the world it represents immensely more.

As a result we approach the realization of this world-wide beneficence with a flood of light which makes it easy of accomplishment, and which makes it no less a pleasure than a duty for this nation, possessed of power and wealth beyond anything known or dreamed of elsewhere, and which has a special and peculiar interest to be subserved, to give fruition to this world-wide want, to this benefaction for which the world has so long hoped and of which it has so long dreamed. It would be tedious and pedantic for me to undertake to review here and now the vast literature of the question, embracing, as it does, the history of exploration, research, and report from the earliest times, the record of many concrete attempts to realize the project, accompanied in each instance with lamentable failure, and the speculation and demonstration of the inestimable value to the world of its accomplishment.

It would be equally tedious and valueless to review the literature of our own country and our own times dealing with the special and peculiar interest which we have in the enterprise, because that is well known to everyone in public life. It is not only well known, but it is so cogent and powerful that it has raised the question of action by this nation above and beyond the controversy of faction and party, a thing rarely seen in any country where policies are settled and determined by standing political organizations. But so it is, and as a result every political party stands committed to the building of an isthmian canal by this nation, and there are but few, if any, in either branch of Congress who do not profess and feel the most earnest and zealous interest in the commencement and carrying on along proper and correct lines of that great and inestimable work. Of course there are selfish interests which would retard it and, if possible, prevent it.

Men have not yet reached, and probably never will reach, that stage of benevolence and philanthropy which enables them to look with favor on any project, however beneficent, which interferes with their own personal profit and advantage. But aside from this interest, which all can readily identify without specific mention, and which I have no disposition to criticise, because I consider its opposition natural, there is no body in this country, I venture to say, or at least but few, who do not agree and insist that the United States must build an interoceanic canal at the Isthmus and who do not agree and insist that the period of study and reflection has passed and the period of action has arrived, and that the work must be entered on by this nation in earnest and at once.

I can not assume that there is any disposition on the part of any one in the Senate to disappoint this insistent sense of the people of the country. But that sense, nevertheless, may be easily disappointed. By divided counsels and an obstinate adherence to ill-conceived opinions we may let slip the supreme opportunity. There is upon this proposition, as upon every other ever presented to the human mind, room for controversy and discussion, and there is not lacking, as before stated, the selfish interest to stir up controversy and to incite to discussion. But there is a saving common sense to cut with the sword of reason the Gordian knot of doubt and indecision which obstructionists have tied, and it is to that saving grace that the friends of an isthmian canal confidently appeal.

After three centuries of agitation and futile effort realization of the mighty project is in sight. Shall captious criticism against that which is possible and feasible and which lies immediately under our hand and requires but the assenting word of the Senate to make an assured fact be permitted to blind us to the sure means of realization? Shall we cease doing that which we know to be good in the vain hope that somehow, somewhere, some time in the indefinite future we may be able to do something better? Shall we play the greedy mongrel and drop our bone in the water in order to grab at the other bone which we see reflected in the water's surface? For one I do not propose, if I can help it, that selfish and greedy interests shall be permitted to throw us back into a position of doubt and uncertainty and chaos. We would emerge therefrom, if ever, after long years of controversy with the chance of losing the present coign of national vantage which we occupy, and with the certainty that in the end we can do no better than if we now go forward in the pathway that reason and common sense and common prudence unerringly point out to us.

No nation is interested equally with ours in an isthmian canal. No nation of late years has given the subject so much research and study. Commission after commission has been appointed, composed of our most eminent men, to visit the Isthmus, study conditions there, and to report concerning the several routes and the feasibility and practicability of each. The verdict has been uniformly in favor of the Nicaragua route, unless the supplemental report of our last Commission be considered an exception. This has been for two reasons. No difficulties of an engineering character out of the ordinary are presented on that route, and the cost of construction there is less than elsewhere. Both these facts were recognized by our last Canal Commission, and induced an unanimous report from it in favor of Nicaragua, but the Commission was unable to resist the allurements of the bargain counter, and with a view of saving $5,000,000 in a $200,000,000 transaction, it changed its former sound conclusion, and in its supplemental report gave the preference to the secondhand, discredited, and abandoned project at Panama. The reasons for this change of front have been discredited by the testimony of the Commissioners themselves and by that of everybody else, taken by the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and this is notably true of the chief reason for preferring Panama, to wit, that by so doing we can save $5,000,000.

Proceeding on the well-known facts of the case, the House of Representatives of the Fifty-sixth Congress passed the Nicaragua Canal bill by a vote which was practically unanimous, but the Senate of that Congress thought it well to await the then promised and long-delayed report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, and that Congress lapsed without Senatorial action. The Commission having subsequently made its report, the House, at the present session of Congress, again passed the Nicaragua Canal bill by a practically unanimous vote, and the question is now presented to the Senate whether it will concur in that action, and thus give certainty and finality to this darling hope of the civilized world.

Mr. President, every commission ever appointed in this country, every man of scientific attainments who has ever studied the question, has declared in favor of the entire feasibility of the Nicaragua route, and that a canal by that route can be constructed as cheaply, to say the least, as by any other route. No one questions, or has ever questioned, either of these facts. De Lesseps himself, the father of the Panama Canal, gave testimony in favor of the Nicaragua route when he said before the committee of the House of Representatives that if a canal with locks was to be built Nicaragua was undoubtedly the preferable route. Since a sea-level canal has now been shown to be impracticable, it must, I think, be conceded that Nicaragua stands on a par, at least, so far as desirability, practicability, and cost goes, with any route across the Isthmus that has ever been considered or is known to man. I think that we may go a step further and say that every other route than Nicaragua and Panama are now eliminated from the equation. Insuperable engineering difficulties and inadmissible cost both stand in the way of the other projects which have been, from time to time, considered and discussed.

The bill for the construction of the canal on the Nicaragua route being on our table, and having behind it the unanimous voice of the House of Representatives, we should, if disposed to build any canal at all, concur in the adoption of that bill unless the alternative proposition, now advanced for the first time, to purchase the Panama derelict and construct a canal on that route has manifest, palpable, and overruling advantages which require and compel its adoption. It has no such advantages, but from every point of view at which it can be looked its disadvantages, as compared with the Nicaragua project, are manifest, palpable, and overruling.

I now invite the attention of the Senate to some of the considerations which seem to me to require us to concur in the action of the House in providing for the construction of the canal by the Nicaragua route, and which render wholly inadmissible the counterproposition to purchase the Panama remnant with a view of attempting to piece it out to completion.

The question of original cost is in favor of Nicaragua. The contrary has been reported, but the facts do not bear out the report. Let us look into the question somewhat in detail. The Nicaragua Canal will cost, according to the estimates of the Commission, $189,864,062. It will cost, according to the same estimate, to complete the Panama Canal $144,233,358. It will cost to purchase the rights of the French company in the Panama Canal in its present incomplete condition $40,000,000. These figures, if correct, would make the Panama Canal cost $184,233,358, as against $189,864,062 for Nicaragua, or an advantage in cost in favor of the Panama project of $5,630,704. But when we look into the two projects in detail this apparent advantage is found to have no foundation in fact. On pages 468 and 469 of Senate Document No. 253, part 2, present session, will be found the following testimony of Admiral Walker:

The CHAIRMAN. In the plan at Panama, did the Commission agree that no dam at Alajuela was necessary?

Admiral WALKER. It was thought best not to estimate for a dam at Alajuela. It was believed by most of the Commission, perhaps all of the Commission, that one was not necessary, but that if in the future there was any trouble about water in the dry season or any trouble with floods in the wet season, that a dam at Alajuela could be readily put in and would serve to control the floods and also to store water.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you ascertain what would be the cost of such a dam

Admiral WALKER. We made no estimate of that. I think the French have an estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the French estimate?

Admiral WALKER. I don't remember what it is; it will cost money to build, of course, but it is a perfectly easy dam to build; it is on rock and across a narrow gorge.

Senator HARRIS. About what would that cost?

Admiral WALKER. I can not say what it would cost. The French have an estimate for it; I don't remember what it was. I do not think we made an estimate on it, but it would cost a million or two, perhaps more. The dam put in there would probably be a concrete dam.

The CHAIRMAN. On page 99 of the report you sum up the whole cost of building the Panama Canal at $144,233,358. Does that include the dam at Alajuela, or conduit?

Admiral WALKER. It does not.

The CHAIRMAN. So that if that must be built hereafter, the cost of that will have to be added to it.

Admiral WALKER. If that was built hereafter, it would be an additional cost. There is no estimate in our report for a dam at Alajuela.

On page 91 of the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, Senate Document No. 54, present session, in discussing the water supply at Panama in the dry season of the year, the Commission uses this language:

The annual flow of the Chagres and the topography of the country are favorable, however, to a very large increase of the supply, if that be found desirable in the future. A reservoir can be constructed at Alajuela with a capacity for storing an additional volume of water four times that now provided for daily consumption.

It is quite evident that the members of the Commission contemplate the possibility at least of being required at some time to relieve and reinforce the Bohio Dam by a dam at Alajuela. The members of the Isthmian Canal Commission are eminent men in their profession, but they are no more so than the international commission of engineers appointed under article 31 of the by-laws of the new Panama Canal Company, which latter commission made its report as late as November, 1898. The membership of the international commission was drawn from France, England, Germany, the United States, Russia, and the Republic of Colombia. I invite the attention of the Senate to what the last-named commission had to say concerning the importance and necessity of a dam at Alajuela. I read from the report of the international commission found in Senate Document No. 303, of the present session, at pages 64, 65, and 66 of said document.

The elaborate discussion of the conditions to be fulfilled in order to harmonize the regulation of the Chagres freshets with the exigencies of water supply for the canal has established the necessity of making provision for two large reservoirs or artificial lakes. The first one, comprising the central region of the canal and containing one of the levels thereof, would be formed by the building of the Bohio Dam (P. K. 24), and would have a maximum flood height fixed at elevation 20 (65.6 feet) or thereabouts. It would cover an area of 5,500 hectares (13,600 acres), and be able to impound, between elevations 17 meters (55.8 feet) and 20 meters (65.6), a reserve of about 150,000,000 cubic meters (5,297 million cubic feet). This storage capacity would be reduced to about 100,000,000 cubic meters (3,532 million cubic feet) by a fluctuation of only 1.75 meters (5.7 feet).

The second lake would be formed in the Upper Chagres Valley by the building of a dam at Alajuela. That dam would form the source of supply of the feeder in case it is decided to build the latter.

At the height adopted for this dam a lake would be formed on the upper river which, at the mean elevation of the storage reserve of the freshets, would cover an area of about 2,600 hectares (6,425 acres), and would allow the impounding, with a change of level of about 4 meters (13.1 feet), of 100,000,000 cubic meters (3,532 million cubic feet), thus completing, with the reserve in the Lake Bohio, the 250,000,000 cubic meters (8,829 million cubic feet) which should be held back during the greatest freshets.

The advisability of building the Alajuela Dam, with its storage reserve, even in the case that a feeder should become unnecessary (on account of Lake Bohio forming the summit level), results from two main considerations: First: The abandonment of Lake Alajuela would lead to the concentration of all the surplus flood waters in the Bohio Lake, which would be possible only by giving the dam an increase of several meters more in height, a scheme unanimously looked upon as overbold, or by lowering the minimum level of the lake as well as that of the bottom of the central cut by several meters, which is not admissible. Second. The abandonment of the upper lake, which constitutes the first regulator of the Chagres floods, would allow that river to enter furiously that portion of the canal territory occupied by the Bohio Lake, where are found, for several kilometers near the point of ingress, bends and natural narrows where the total volume of the freshets would certainly produce currents detrimental and dangerous to navigation. It is true that resource could be had to a suspension of navigation at critical times, but it would be a regrettable alternative of a nature to throw a certain amount of discredit upon the efficiency of the canal; it is certainly preferable to avoid this objection by a relatively small additional outlay. Moreover, it is important to notice that the building of this dam will provide a considerable motive power which will be advantageously applied in the working of the canal itself. The expense incurred would thus be plainly justified by the financial return to be obtained therefrom.

From this same report, at page 92 of Senate Document No. 303, I find the cost of the Alajuela Dam and spillway estimated at $2,356,700. I do not imagine, taking the two reports together, and weighing the careful manner in which Admiral Walker testified concerning Alajuela, that anyone can have much doubt that a dam at that point is an essential to the success of the Panama Canal. We thus have the additional sum of $2,356,700 to be charged up as part of the cost of the Panama project. An additional charge of $1,000,000 and more against the Panama route is found in the fact that the Isthmian Canal Commission, in its report of the cost of completing the Panama Canal, failed to take account of the necessity of building a temporary dam at Bohio to divert the waters of the Chagres River while the permanent dam there was being constructed. I invite attention to the testimony of Admiral Walker on that subject, found at pages 469 and 470 of Senate Document No. 253, part 2:

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think it is possible to build a permanent dam at Bohio without fencing off the waters of the Chagres River in the rainy season?

Admiral WALKER. A temporary dam would do that. The French scheme, you know, was to put in a temporary dam and let the waters of the Chagres go through the cut made for the locks; whether that would be enough is a question; if not, it would have to be raised so as to escape by the Gigante Spillway.

The CHAIRMAN. But a temporary dam in some form would be necessary in order to enable you to build the permanent dam?

Admiral WALKER. I should rather leave that to the engineers. I do not pass an opinion on that. I should think most probably a temporary dam would be necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. What would be the cost of a temporary dam there that would fence off the waters of the Chagres and enable you to build a permanent dam?

Admiral WALKER. I can not give an estimate on the cost. That is out of my line.

The CHAIRMAN. It would cost more than $1,000,000?

Admiral WALKER. Perhaps.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in your estimate of the cost of the Bohio dam?

Admiral WALKER. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You have omitted entirely any temporary structure?

Admiral WALKER. That is what I understand.

An additional charge must be made against the Panama project for 1,466 shares of the Panama Railroad stock held by the general public. When the Government destroys the commercial value of that property it must take up the stock held by private individuals. The Commission assumes that that can be done by paying the holders par for their stock, but this is doubtful. The Government of the United States can not resort to the squeezing process as individuals sometimes do. When it winds up the Commercial Company it must pay shareholders at least their pro rata proportion of the value of the assets of the company.

Mr. Drake, the vice-president and secretary of the Pamana Railroad Company, testified before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals that the property was worth $13,000,000 less $2,500,000 of mortgage indebtedness, and he testified, further, that the road was paying, and would pay, large dividends, and that these would be much increased during the construction of the canal by the United States, and that the company had the exclusive right to operate and maintain a railway there until the year 1966. This testimony will be found on page 248 of Senate Document No. 253, part 1, and it shadows forth the nature of the claim which these 1,466 individuals will make against the United States when it undertakes to retire their stock. They must be paid their pro rata of $11,500,000, the present net value of the property, which would make their stock worth $164.28 per share, and they must be paid such additional sum as represents the value of the right of the shares to participate in large dividends for sixty-six years more, including the enormous dividends to accrue from canal construction. This last right will be certainly claimed, and probably held, to be worth $135.72 per share, making the cost to the Government of retiring this individual stock $300 per share, or in the aggregate $439,800.

Next, the Government must pay and retire the bonded indebtedness of the railway company. This is placed by Mr. Drake at $2,500,000, but it appears from the supplemental report of the Isthmian Canal Commission that there is to be added to this sum $996,000 advanced to the Colombian Government in payment of the annual subsidy of the railway to that Government under its concession up to November 1, 1910, which advance was made on good consideration and can not now be reclaimed. The Colombian Government having disposed of these bonds, they must be paid off and retired. The sum total of these bonds of the railroad according to the report of the Commission is:

Advanced to Colombia	996,000
Total	3,486,918

But this is not all in the way of cash payments we are to be called on to make. Colombia, in the draft of a treaty presented by her, stipulates with us that she shall be paid the full par value of the 50,000 shares of stock which she holds in the New Panama Canal Company, the aggregate par value of said shares being $1,000,000. This means that we are to pay said sum, since neither we nor Colombia have any control over the $40,000,000 paid to the French company; and if we guarantee the sum to Colombia, of course we must pay it. I will now recapitulate the several sums which I have mentioned:

Cost of Alhajuela Dam	$2,356,700
Cost of temporary dam at Bohio	1,000,000
Retiring 1,466 shares Panama Railroad stock	439,800
Retiring bonded indebtedness of Panama Railroad Company	3,486,918
Retiring 50,000 shares New Panama Canal Company stock	1,000,000
Total	8,283,418

Mr. CLAY. If the Senator will permit me in that connection, I understand that the Panama Canal Company own a certain amount of the stock of the Panama Railroad Company, and in making this purchase for $40,000,000 the Government of the United States will not get anything except the stock in the Panama Railroad Company owned by the Panama Canal Company. Is it not also true that there will be outstanding shares in the Panama Railroad Company owned by private individuals that we will not purchase at all?

Mr. TURNER. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. To what amount?

Mr. TURNER. All the stock of the Panama Railroad Company we get is that which is owned by the Panama Canal Company.

Mr. CLAY. That is what I thought.

Mr. TURNER. That stock amounts to 68,534 shares, leaving out 1,466 shares of stock in the hands of individuals, which, as I have shown, must be retired at a cost of $439,800, if they are willing that it shall be retired on any terms whatever, making an additional outlay, as I have before stated, of $8,283,418.

This sum, added to the former sum estimated by the Commission, makes the cost to us of the Panama Canal $192,516,776, or $2,652,714 more than the estimated cost of the Nicaragua Canal.

I have gone into this matter in detail, not because I believe the matter of a few millions of dollars is of any great moment in the settlement of this question, but to satisfy the scruples of those who attach importance to that feature, and who have been led to believe that in the matter of cost the advantage is with the Panama route. For myself I agree with Mr. Edward P. North, the eminent civil engineer, who declares that the United States would be justified "in building the Nicaragua Canal if the Panama Canal could be completed and given to the country."

I have not taken into account other large expenditures which the adoption of the Panama route will entail, because, while they are of importance and will run up into the millions, I have no means of even approximating the sum which they will require. Colombia in the canal treaty tendered to us, and which we must accept if we buy the Panama Canal, restricts us to a canal zone 5 kilometers in width on each side of the canal and excludes therefrom the city of Panama and the city of Colon, which exclusion covers the bays, harbors, and public works therein in front of each city. This will render necessary the construction of a port at each entrance to the canal, if vessels are to have anchorage pending transit, under the protection of the canal treaty. How much this will cost no one knows, but it seems reasonably certain that it will be large—probably several millions of dollars.

The United States is also to be required to build and maintain hospitals and works of drainage, sanitary, and healthful purposes along the line of the canal and its dependencies. This stipulation is no doubt a wise and just one, because the Isthmus of Panama is the hotbed of all the virulent diseases known to tropical countries, and when that section becomes more thickly populated there will be a constant and never-ending conflict between science on the one hand and disease and death on the other. But the necessity for such works does not in any way lighten the burden of the expenditure, which it can be seen will be very considerable in the matter of first cost and never ending in the matter of maintenance. It does, however, give room for pause with thoughtful men, and induces in their minds a doubt whether works of such magnitude, bringing to this point constantly from all quarters of the world so large a number of unacclimated people, ought to be undertaken under such forbidding conditions of health and mortality. But that is a consideration which it is not my purpose to discuss.

The United States, for the same reason, is to be required to supply the cities of Colon and Panama with pure and healthful water, and to that end is to build necessary aqueducts and drainage works to supply water and to drain the cities. How much this will cost is a pure matter of speculation. We are absolutely without data on which to figure. Much will depend on the distance necessary to go for pure water, and much upon the ease with which the situation of these cities will permit them to yield to sanitary drainage. We know nothing about either problem. The cost may be anywhere from two million to ten millions of dollars.

I beg leave to insert here, without reading, article 5 of the canal treaty proposed by the Republic of Colombia, from which it will be seen that the additional expenditures at Panama, to which I have referred, must be incurred and paid if we take over the uncompleted Panama Canal.

ARTICLE V.

The Republic of Colombia authorizes the United States to construct and maintain at each entrance and terminus of the proposed canal a port for vessels using the same, with suitable light-houses and other aids to navigation; and the United States is authorized to use and occupy within the limits of the zone fixed by this convention such parts of the coast line and of the lands and islands adjacent thereto as are necessary for this purpose, including the construction and maintenance of breakwaters, dikes, jetties, embankments, coaling stations, docks, and other appropriate works. And the United States undertakes the construction and maintenance of such works, and will bear all the expense thereof. The ports, when established, shall be declared free, and their demarcations shall be clearly and definitely defined.

To give effect to this article, the United States will give special attention and care to the maintenance of works of drainage, sanitary, and healthful purposes along the line of the canal and its dependencies, in order to prevent the invasion of epidemics, or of securing their prompt suppression, should they appear. With this end in view the United States will organize hospitals along the line of the canal and will suitably supply the towns of Panama and Colon with the necessary aqueducts and drainage works, in order to prevent their becoming centers of infection on account of their proximity to the canal.

The Government of Colombia will secure the possession of the land that may be required in the towns of Panama and Colon to effect the improvements above referred to, and the Government of the United States shall be authorized to impose and collect equitable water rates previously agreed upon with the Government of Colombia during fifty years for the service rendered; but on the expiration of said term the use of the water shall be free for the inhabitants of Panama and Colon, except to the extent that may be necessary for the maintenance of said aqueducts.

I beg Senators to bear in mind that these additional expenditures at Panama are not offset by similar additional expenditures required to be made at Nicaragua. The problem there was considered by the Canal Commission anew and in its entirety, and the estimate of cost includes harbors at either end and necessary works for the preservation of health, the latter, however, being simple and comparatively inexpensive on that route. There are no cities on that route to require expensive waterworks and drainage systems, and, of course, no estimate of cost for such works was made by the Commission. If such cities shall grow up in the course of time, the duty will devolve on Nicaragua of providing for their wants.

The friends of Panama allege only those grounds of additional expenditure on the Nicaragua route over those considered and estimated for by the Commission, to wit: (a) Land damages caused by flooding, etc.; (b) right of way; (c) settlement for outstanding concessions. But it should be remembered that the items (a) and (b) apply equally to both routes, and while not specifically mentioned in the estimate of the Commission for either route, are covered by the 20 per cent allowed for contingencies. The item (c), viz, retirement of outstanding concessions, need not trouble anyone. There is not a valid outstanding concession on the Nicaragua route, nor has there been any pretense of such a concession which could stand in our way. Our concession comes from Nicaragua, and that sovereignty will stand between us and any interruption of canal work and between us and any claim for compensation, except as to the claim of the old Maritime Canal Company. The whole matter is covered by Articles X and XI of the canal treaty proposed by Nicaragua, which read as follows:

ARTICLE X.

Nicaragua covenants with the United States and guarantees that no concession, grant, or license for the purpose of trade, commerce, transportation, navigation, or for the construction of a ship canal in or through Nicaraguan territory, has been made to any other government, corporation, syndicate, or person, natural or juridical, which in any manner encumbers or conflicts with the lease and the rights and privileges hereby granted.

ARTICLE XI.

Although maintaining that, upon the principles of justice, no valid claims of citizens of the United States exist against Nicaragua, the latter accepts the engagement of the United States to pay and to discharge Nicaragua from all liabilities on account of claims of citizens of the United States which may have arisen prior to the date of the signing of this convention.

It is true that the Maritime Canal Company, when its concession was declared forfeited by Nicaragua, protested against that action and procured the diplomatic intervention of this Government; but the forfeiture was so manifestly just and legal that Nicaragua stood her ground, and the forfeiture was maintained. She thought proper, however, in presenting a canal treaty, in view of the former action of this Government, to insist on section 11 of the treaty, whereby the United States is made to assume the obligations of dealing with any claim of her own citizens. The extent to which this claim is likely to embarrass us is seen from the testimony of the officials of the Maritime Canal Company taken before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. Mr. T. B. Atkins, the secretary of that company, testified:

Senator KITTREDGE. In the event the United States selects the Nicaragua route for the canal and agrees, as a part of the negotiations, to pay a certain sum to Nicaragua and Costa Rica for the concessions, what, if any, action would your company take in reference to attaching or seeking to hold that money?

Mr. ATKINS. Well, I can not speak for the others, but so far as my judgment of their disposition is concerned, I should say not any.

Senator KITTREDGE. Are you able to speak for the other stockholders and directors?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir. I assume that the Government would not make such a proposition to Nicaragua and entirely disregard the rights of the Maritime Canal Company.

Senator KITTREDGE. In other words, you understand that the United States will not enter into any negotiations for the purchase of concessions from Nicaragua or Costa Rica without taking into account and adjusting your claim?

Mr. ATKINS. I do not understand anything. I assume merely that the Government of the United States would act equitably in the whole matter, and whatever they might consider equitable I believe that the company would accept.

Capt. Jacob W. Miller, one of the prominent stockholders of that company, testified as follows:

Senator HANNA. The Maritime Company, with which you say the Government has to deal, still claims, as I understand, the validity of its concessions from Costa Rica and Nicaragua?

Captain MILLER. Yes; they have done that as a matter of form, of course. I think in addition to that, if I remember correctly, that the president of the Maritime Company, Mr. Hitchcock, before he died, wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Interior stating that the Maritime Company was willing to accept anything proper in equity, in the building of the Nicaragua Canal, that the Government should see fit to give. My recollection is that such a letter was written.

Senator HANNA. Do you mean by that that there would be no claims on the part of the Maritime Canal Company or the construction company against the Government if it should undertake to finish the canal?

Captain MILLER. Well, not beyond what the Government owes us in equity.

Senator HANNA. And how much is that?

Captain MILLER. I think the claim was $5,000,000—the money we have actually expended.

Senator HANNA. And you still consider that a valid claim?

Captain MILLER. I think it is valid to the extent of justice and equity for money actually expended in keeping before the American people for eighteen years what we consider the American canal.

Senator KITTREDGE. The Maritime Canal Company looks to the Government of the United States, as I understood your statement. Is that right?

Captain MILLER. As I said before, I am not an officer in that company. I should say, personally, as a shareholder——

Senator KITTREDGE. As a stockholder of the construction company?

Captain MILLER. Of both companies; I should say that I wanted to see the canal built, and I think everyone wants exactly the same thing. All we have done in that company is to keep the Nicaragua project before the people. We do not ask for anything except what the Government wants to give us.

Senator KITTREDGE. Still they have a claim, as you understand it, which they, perhaps, would press against the United States?

Captain MILLER. We have spent $4,500,000 in eighteen years of patriotic work for America and an American canal, and we think the Government ought to give it back to us.

Senator KITTREDGE. You think the Government ought to give you back the money you have spent, with interest?

Captain MILLER. Yes, sir; we think we ought to have that.

It will be seen, then, that the claim in its entirety which may be made against us by the Maritime Canal Company is between four and five million dollars; that that claim is not asserted as a legal claim, but merely as a broad equity; that it is not in fact a legal claim, and that it will depend on the discretion of Congress whether it ever pays one cent to the Maritime Canal Company.

The Senate may see from the foregoing how thin and insubstantial this bugaboo is which our friends who favor Panama have raised and which to their affrighted imagination has taken the shape of a cloud on our title to the Nicaragua concession which it will require $20,000,000 to dissipate. I repeat again that no expenditure is required in the construction of the Nicaragua Canal not estimated for by the Isthmian Canal Commission, nor is there any claim, legal or equitable, standing in the way of our acquiring perfect right there which it will require one cent to wipe out and satisfy. On the other hand, if we acquire the Panama Canal, $20,000,000 would be a modest estimate of the sum required to be spent in the completion of the canal and the supplemental works required over and above the estimate of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

The cost of maintenance after construction is another feature which recommends Panama to the Isthmian Canal Commision and which has been urged to predispose the Senate in favor of that project. Some advantage may be confessed in favor of Panama in the matter of cost of maintenance. The canal is shorter than that over the Nicaragua route and the number of locks less. But the cost of maintenance on both routes is placed at a very high figure by the Commission, and it much exceeds the estimates of those who have had great experience and who are equally competent with the Commission to make an estimate, and it much exceeds the known cost of maintenance in other and similar canals now in successful operation.

The Commission estimates the cost of maintenance for the Panama Canal at $2,000,000 per annum; for the Nicaragua Canal at $3,300,000 per annum. Taking the Panama Canal at 50 miles in length, this estimate is equivalent to $40,000 per mile per annum for maintenance. Excluding 120 miles of slack-water navigation, created by the Conchuda Dam on the Nicaragua Canal, which slack water extends from the dam to the west side of Lake Nicaragua and which can need but little, if any, expenditure for maintenance, the estimate of the Commission for maintenance of the Nicaragua Canal is equivalent to $45,000 per mile per annum.

The extreme liberality of these estimates will be seen when we compare them with the actual cost of maintenance for existing canals. The annual cost of maintenance and operation of the Suez Canal is $13,000 per mile; that of the Kiel Canal is $8,600 per mile; that of the Manchester Canal is $9,500 per mile. The Suez Canal is a sea-level canal, but the two last-named canals are lock canals, and the cost of their maintenance includes depreciation in machinery and repairs thereof and the salary of employees to work the locks, the same as will exist with a canal at the Isthmus. The conditions under which they are operated are in some respects more favorable and in some respects less favorable than those which exist at the Isthmus, but, assuming that they are all more favorable, it is hard to understand why there should be so great a disparity as these figures exhibit.

I have not noticed in this connection the St. Marys Falls Canal in Michigan, because, as noted by the Isthmian Canal Commission, its short length, large proportion of mechanical structure, and immense traffic place it in a class by itself and render comparison with it of little value. Yet it is worthy of mention that the cost of maintaining and operating the 1¼ miles of that canal, with its great proportion of mechanical structure, and with an annual traffic three or four times as great as that of all other canals in the world combined, is only from $46,000 to $60,000 per mile.

As against the estimate of the Isthmian Canal Commission we have that of Mr. Lyman E. Cooley, of Chicago, the constructor of the Chicago Drainage Canal, based on the data for the deep waterway from Lake Erie to Hudson River, at New York, as given by the Board of Engineers on Deep Waterways, 1900, and according to this estimate of Mr. Cooley the cost of operating and maintaining the Nicaragua Canal will be $1,400,000. We also have the estimate of Mr. Charles T. Harvey, who planned, constructed, and operated the St. Marys Canal, which is, for the operation and maintenance of the Nicaragua Canal, $1,000,000. I beg leave to insert here, without reading, the very interesting and valuable letter of Mr. Cooley on this subject.

DEAR SENATOR: In further response to your letter of 16th instant in regard to maintenance and operation of the Nicaragua Canal, it will be instructive to exhibit in parallel columns the significant data for the deep waterway from Lake Erie to the Hudson River at New York, as given by the Board of Engineers on Deep Waterways, 1900, and for the Nicaragua Canal by the high-level plan, as suggested in my testimony of February 24 before your committee.

The Erie-Hudson waterway is via Lake Ontario and the Mohawk Valley, and is to be 30 feet deep, with locks 740 by 80 by 30 feet. The Nicaragua waterway is to be 35 feet deep, with locks 740 by 84 by 35 feet.

Item.	Erie-Hudson.	Nicaragua.	Ratio.
Summit level, L. W.	574.5	105	-------
Lockage, feet	839.2	210	4
Number of locks	38	6	6⅓
Standard canal, miles	102.4	34	3
Canalized river, lake, and harbors, 250 to 1,000 feet wide, miles	96	36	1⅓
Open lake and river, do	278.6	55	-------
Total length, do	477	193	-------
Estimate	$284,000,000	$189,000,000	1½
Traffic, net register tons	20	7	3
Operation and maintenance	$2,930,000	$1,100,000	2⅔

The above comparison is made by inspection, as the details from which operation and maintenance are made up are not exhibited in the report. The doubts have been thrown against the Nicaragua Canal. The Nicaragua Canal will be less subject to deterioration in prism, structures, and canalized rivers, owing to freedom from frost, more stable soil, and comparative freedom from floods.

The comparison indicates that the flat estimate for the Nicaragua route will be about three-eighths of the estimate of $2,930,000 for the operation and maintenance of the Erie-Hudson route, or $1,100,000 in round numbers. No large increase will be required for Nicaragua when once the canal is opened and the country developed. There will be an increase in some items, due to the longer season of navigation and a relative decrease in others for climate reasons, as noted. The estimate for Nicaragua may therefore be increased to $1,500,000, assuming that the estimate of $2,930,000 is proper for the Erie-Hudson route.

A trial estimate may be made up by items as follows:

Locks and structures: Take one-half of 1 per cent on structures and 5 per cent on equipment, for maintenance and depreciation; service for duplicate locks, lighting, etc., total	$450,000
Dredging: Maintenance and betterment of intermediate channels and harbors	200,000
Aids to navigation: Lights, beacons, buoys, signals, telegraph, and telephones	100,000
Pilotage: Based on experience of ship channel, Quebec-Montreal, 160 miles	100,000
Towage: Based on assumption of 1,000,000 to 2,000,000 tons sailing vessels	100,000
Police: Based on 2½ times requirement of sanitary district of Chicago during construction	150,000
Administration and general expenses	200,000
Contingent items	100,000
Total operation and maintenance	1,400,000

It is to be noted that duplicate locks swell the estimate. These are not required for any traffic in sight, but for insurance against possible accident. The dredging estimate contemplates progressive development of intermediate channels and harbors. The item of aids to navigation is probably more than sufficient, owing to use of searchlights in night navigation, a practice growing on our lakes and rivers. The items of pilotage and towage depend on traffic and deductions from toll bills. Police depends on turbulence of population. I apprehend that it will be little more than required in the States.

From the foregoing the probable cost will lie between $1,000,000 and $1,500,000 per year.

Hoping that the foregoing will answer your purpose, I am,

Yours, truly,

LYMAN E. COOLEY.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. President, it is only fair to say that if the estimate of the Canal Commission is high for maintenance and operation at Nicaragua, it is correspondingly high for maintenance and operation at Panama, and that the same relative disparity would still exist between the cost at Nicaragua and at Panama. But in view of other considerations, which I shall now proceed to mention, it makes a considerable difference whether the disparity is $1,300,000 or is only four or five hundred thousand, or less, as the foregoing figures seem to indicate.

According to Article XII of the treaty proposed by Nicaragua, the United States is to pay Nicaragua $25,000 per annum for the right to construct and maintain the Nicaragua Canal; and we have every reason to expect that the rental to Costa Rica, which that Government will demand for the small portion of its territory encroached on, will be nominal and merely for the purpose of perpetuating and maintaining evidence of its sovereignty over the territory employed.

Our annual rental to both countries will not amount to more than $30,000 per annum. Colombia, on the other hand, by Article XXV of the treaty proposed by it, demands as the price of the Panama Canal, an annuity to be agreed upon by the two governments at the expiration of fourteen years from the ratification of treaty, based upon the principle of compensation for the use of the zone granted for canal purposes, for the proprietary rights over the Panama Railroad, for the $250,000 in gold per annum which it now receives from the railroad and which it will cease to receive, and for other rights, privileges, and exemptions granted to the United States, and for the increase in the administrative expenses of the Department of Panama consequent on the construction of the canal.

Until the expiration of the fourteen years, during which entire time the canal will be in course of construction, it contents itself with the lump sum of $7,000,000, which is equivalent to an annuity of $500,000 per annum. If the two Governments are unable to agree on the amount of the permanent annuity when the time comes to fix it, the question is to be left to arbitration, and the president of The Hague Arbitration Tribunal is to be selected as the fifth and controlling arbitrator. The sum thus ascertained is to control for one hundred years, and at the end of that period, and at the end of each succeeding one hundred years thereafter, the annuity is to be fixed in the like manner.

The sum to be paid down to Panama, to wit, $7,000,000, is identical with the sum demanded by Nicaragua and Costa Rica, but there is an important difference in the character of the two payments. In the case of Nicaragua and Costa Rica the payment is a bonus pure and simple. In the case of Panama it is in the nature of a rental for fourteen years, and fixes an annual sum during the period of construction, below which it would be unreasonable to expect an arbitrator to go after the canal had been completed, but offering no obstacle to the allowance of a much larger sum based on the considerations mentioned in the treaty. Undoubtedly no lesser sum will ever be accepted voluntarily or awarded by arbitration, but there is every probability that a larger sum may be awarded as the result of arbitration.

Colombia will be able to show before an arbitration tribunal that she was disadvantaged in the sum of $500,000 per annum by her grant to the United States in two, only, of the grounds fixed as the basis of compensation. She loses $250,000 per annum from the Panama Railway, and she loses her agreed percentage of the tolls to be collected by the New Panama Canal Company, which percentage, that company agreed, should never be less than $250,000 per annum. She will still have left as the basis for a still higher award the onerous and dangerous character of the grant to another sovereign government, the exceptional character of the rights, privileges, and exemptions granted that government, and the increase, by reason thereof, of the administrative expenses of her own Government. Five hundred thousand dollars per annum is the least sum that we may expect, with the strong probabilities that $500,000 more will be added thereto, and with the possibility of an indefinitely increased sum as the centuries roll around.

It seems to me, in view of the foregoing, that we may safely assume that the annuity to be paid Colombia, added to the cost of maintenance and operation of the canal there, will bring the cost of maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal fully up to that of the Nicaragua Canal. If this be true, then I have shown, and I think beyond the power of successful refutation, that there is no advantage in favor of the Panama Canal, either in the matter of original cost or in the matter of the cost of maintenance and operation. And since the Nicaragua bill is here with the unanimous voice of the House of Representatives behind it, since no man has ever been able to allege anything against the entire feasibility of that project, since it is conceded on all hands to be more valuable to us from a commercial and military standpoint than any other canal, and since we can build it for less money than any other, and maintain and operate it for as little, why should we not now pass the House bill and have done with the matter? I shall wait with much interest and curiosity a fair and unbiased statement of the reasons for any different course of conduct.

Mr. President, while it is admitted that there are no engineering difficulties out of the ordinary to be encountered in building the Nicaragua Canal, the same thing is not admitted of the Panama Canal. The Isthmian Canal Commission admits the great difficulties connected with the building of the Panama Canal, but with characteristic American optimism the members dismiss these difficulties with the suggestion that given time and money enough everything is possible. But I respectfully suggest that in this they are mistaken. We have just had an appalling illustration of the insignificance of man and all his works. There are forces of nature against which he is as powerless as an insect, and it is claimed by many who are skilled and experienced in works of engineering magnitude that there are such forces which will ever prevent the successful construction and operation of a canal at Panama.

I am not an engineer, but there are engineers of equal merit with those on the Isthmian Canal Commission who look on a canal at Panama with the utmost distrust, and who predict greater difficulties than the Commission is willing to admit in construction and certain disaster at some time in operation. I shall not go into this matter to any great extent, but will content myself with contrasting the views of the international commission appointed by the New Panama Canal Company to investigate and report on the Panama project, to which I have before referred, with the optimistic views of our own Commission, and with showing by the report of the international commission that our own Commission, in order to bring the Panama project within a reasonable limit of cost, has adopted methods and means which the international commission deemed dangerous and wholly inadmissible.

It should be remembered that this international commission was provided for in the articles of the New Panama Canal Company, and that it was made international in character in order that the company might have the world to draw from in the selection of its membership, and in order that the world might be assured of the verity and correctness of its findings and conclusions. Its report was made only four years ago. Speaking of the difficulties of the canal problem at Panama, the international commission uses this language:

> The building of a maritime canal across the Isthmus of Panama encounters, from a technical point of view, two main difficulties. These are, on the one hand, the chain of the Cordilleras, which must be crossed by a cut about 110 meters deep (361 feet) if a sea-level canal is contemplated, or by a very considerable cut, but little less than 70 meters deep (230 feet), if a canal with locks is intended. On the other hand, there is the river Chagres, a torrential stream, subject to sudden freshets, of which the canal must necessarily follow the valley for a great portion of its length and against which it must be protected by a proper regulation of the flow in order to insure the safety of navigation.
> A third difficulty of a general nature presents itself when a canal with locks is considered; the question of water supply assumes, on account of the extent of the several needs to be provided for, an importance suggested by the fact that the accumulated flow of the Chagres itself and of the other streams on the line of the canal becomes insufficient during a certain portion of the year.
> The first two difficulties increase as a lower and lower level of the canal is sought, and acquire their maxim of intensity in the case of a canal without locks.
> On the contrary, the third difficulty, which appears only with a canal with locks, becomes greater as the summit level is raised.
> The first difficulty, relative to the excavation of the great cut at the summit separating the two watersheds, does not raise any special technical question; it is simply the work to be done by manual labor, which may require more or less time and expenditure, but which, being without any inherent element of impossibility on account of the well-known character of the material, does not require any special study. It is the practical problem of a large excavation to be made within a restricted space.
> PRINCIPAL DIFFICULTY ENCOUNTERED BY A CANAL WITHOUT LOCKS.
> The second difficulty, due to the presence of the river Chagres upon the same territory as the canal, is, in view of possible consequences of a more serious order. The rectification of the bed of the river for the purpose of utilizing it for the canal can not be contemplated. The irregularity of the flow and the violence of the large freshets are incompatible with a solution of that kind. To turn the stream completely from its course and to direct it to the Pacific slope, far from the location selected for the canal, an idea formerly advanced and in part considered, would be a colossal undertaking, requiring an amount of labor which would render it impracticable. It is a solution upon which it does not seem possible to dwell. It therefore becomes necessary to make of the river and of the canal two neighbors, whose character and wants are to be harmonized. This is a solution which seems very difficult when considering a canal without locks. In fact, from whatever point of view it is considered we must acknowledge that it is necessary to prepare parallel to the canal an artificial waterway capable of discharging under occasional flood conditions a very large flow per second, and this even when the waters of a large portion of the watershed have been temporarily stored in a reservoir to be provided.
> An artificial bed established at a higher elevation than the canal itself would prove to be not only a work very difficult to execute, but also to be a danger, a permanent menace, to the canal itself.
> We can consequently state that the principal obstacle to the execution of a canal without locks results less from the difficulties entailed by the execution of a deep cut at the summit than from those which spring from the proximity of the Chagres in the region to be crossed before reaching that summit. It will not, perhaps, be too much to maintain that herein lies an obstacle insurmountable to a conception of that kind.

In discussing the problem of the control of Chagres River and the supply of water for the upper level of the canal in seasons of drought the International Commission is wholly at variance with our own Commission. The International Commission says:

MODE OF SUPPLYING WATER TO THE CANAL.

The question of water supply for the canal has given rise to the most varied and complete studies. The technical commission decided that they could not admit the principle of a mechanical supply as a final solution. Whatever precautions might be taken, such a solution, independently of the great permanent expense entailed, would be too precarious to be admitted for the operation of a canal of such a magnitude. Hence only two solutions were left as possible—either direct supply by the Chagres, transformed into a lake, which itself would constitute the summit level of the canal (this arrangement had been adopted by the commission of 1890), or supply through a feeder from a point in the upper valley where a reservoir could be formed by the building of a dam, the flow line of which should be so calculated as to carry the water supply to the summit level at the proper elevation.

DIRECT FEEDING BY THE CHAGRES.

Concerning the first of these methods, it was ascertained by local examinations and investigations that the solution pointed out by the commission d'etudes could not be applied; that in the whole of the Lower Chagres Valley—between Gamboa and the sea—only one location showed favorable conditions for the building of a high dam capable of impounding a lake which could become the summit level.

That location is that of Bohio Soldado (P. K. 24 of the canal line), where the above-named commission had located a secondary reservoir to form the second level of the canal in their plan. The character of the formation at that point in the thalweg of the Chagres allows the building of an earth dam of a certain height; but, after carefully studying the geological formation of the underground strata, which was clearly revealed by numerous test pits, the technical commission unanimously agreed that it would not be prudent to build on that location a dam forming a reservoir of a depth of more than 20 meters (65.6 feet) above the river bed, which at that point is at about the mean level of the sea.

Considering the importance of that structure in relation to the safety of the canal itself, it was deemed that here, more than anywhere else, it was necessary to be very cautious, and consequently the maximum elevation of 20 meters (65.6 feet) was fixed upon as that of the level of the lake to be formed by the building of the Bohio Dam.

Under these conditions, if it is desirable to adopt the Chagres itself as a feeder by utilizing the central lake formed as above stated as the summit level of the canal, the maximum elevation of that level must be 20 meters (65.6 feet) or thereabouts. From this it follows that with a minimum depth of 9 meters (29.5 feet) in the canal, and allowing for a certain variation in its level, due to the variable supply it may receive, the bottom of the summit level, of which the deep cut would be a part, must be established in the neighborhood of elevation 10 (32.8 feet).

Such is the result to which we are led in considering direct feeding through the Chagres if we do not wish, in determining the proportions to be given to the main structure of that plan, to deviate from the prudent rules which the commission consider as absolute.

And further:

SOLUTIONS OF THE SECOND TYPE.

The solutions considered under the second type, in which the summit level is a part of Lake Bohio traversed by the Chagres, are reducible to two.

In the one a single lake only is to be built—Lake Bohio—and it must provide for all necessities—the water supply and operation of the canal and the regulation of the freshets of the Chagres. In this system, the bottom of the summit level being established at elevation 10 meters (32.8 feet), the maximum level of its water surface, which would be also that of the lake, could reach elevation 24.50 meters (80.4 feet) in the large freshets, and the Bohio Dam should be raised to elevation 27.50 meters (90.2 feet), which would be about 30 meters (98.4 feet) above its foundations.

In the other a first lake would be formed on the Upper Chagres by the Alajuela Dam. The function of this lake would be to store up all water needed for supplying and operating the canal, as well as a great portion (the largest) of the excess of the freshets. In that case, the bottom of the summit level remaining practically at the same elevation as before, the maximum level of Lake Bohio would not exceed elevation 20.50 meters (67.3 feet), and the dam would remain very nearly within the limits established for all the plans of the first type. This solution is the only one meeting the conditions for the regulating of the freshets without giving the Bohio Dam such proportions as are considered too bold. On that account principally, and also by reason of the advantages which, in any event, the Alajuela Dam presents by providing a considerable hydraulic power and by permitting a preliminary regulation of the Chagres before entering the canal territory, it has appeared proper to adopt this solution preferably to the first.

It will thus be seen that the International Commission, after the most mature consideration, rejected as dangerous and impracticable the project of a dam at Bohio with an elevation of more than 67.3 feet. This being its conclusion, if Bohio Lake was to be the upper level of the canal, it would be necessary to excavate the canal through Culebra hill down to an elevation of 32.8 feet, an enormous work, taking much time and a large sum of money. Our Commission has surmounted this difficulty by boldy raising the height of the Bohio dam to 100 feet, thereby raising the elevation of the cut at Culebra and avoiding the time and expense of excavation therein.

I read on this point from the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission at pages 90 and 91 of its report:

No location suitable for a dam exists on the Chagres River below Bohio, and while this location is not without difficulties, it has the great advantage that about 3 miles southwest of the dam, near the head of the Rio Gigante, a tributary of the Chagres, there exists an excellent site for a spillway, by which the discharge from the lake can be kept well away from the dam and accessory works, and may be made extremely large without inconvenience either to the canal itself or to the country below the lake. The height of this spillway would regulate the height and area of the lake. After careful consideration of the requirements for flood control and for storage against deficiency in the dry season, and also of the effect upon the amount of excavation required for the canal through the continental divide, the Commission has decided to fix this height at 85 feet above mean tide and to make the spillway a fixed weir 2,000 feet long. The area of the lake at this height is 38.5 square miles or 1,073,318,400 square feet. Using coefficient 3.5 in the weir formula, it is computed that with a depth of 5 feet over its crest the weir will discharge 78,260 cubic feet per second. In reaching elevation 90 the area of the lake will be enlarged to about 43 square miles and it will impound over 5,680,000,000 cubic feet of water.

The quantity of water discharged over the weir while the lake is rising from elevation 85 to elevation 90, assuming circumstances of flow similar to those observed in the flood of 1893, is computed to be about 4,000,000,000 cubic feet. (See Appendix E.) The total quantity of water impounded and discharged before the lake will rise above elevation 90 is therefore nearly 10,000,000,000 cubic feet. It provides for unimpeded navigation during all floods not exceeding 75,000 cubic feet per second. The velocity of the currents in the narrowest part of the lake would not exceed 2 feet per second. Floods may occur, however, which will cause the lake to rise above elevation 90. From the data available it is not possible to compute with precision the exact height which a flood may hereafter attain, but the extreme possible effect of a flood discharging 140,000 cubic feet per second for a prolonged period would be to raise the water over the spillway to 92.5 feet. All great floods are of short duration, and such a flood is absolutely without precedent, being as improbable as any other convulsion of nature. The crest of the dam has, however, been placed at 100 and the top of the lock walls and gates at 94, to make them entirely safe from overflow by even such a flood, the ill effect of which would be limited to the temporary obstruction of navigation by swift currents in the narrowest part of the lake, where the velocity might reach 5 feet per second. Under extreme conditions the lake might be lowered to 82 to provide water for operating the canal during the dry months. The excavations will be so adjusted as to give a depth of 35 feet at that level.

Mr. President, I do not say that a dam 100 feet high at Bohio is dangerous. I do not know anything about it. But the International Commission says it is dangerous, and although such a dam would have enormously reduced the cost of the Culebra excavation and conduced to an earlier completion of the canal, that Commission declined to recommend it to the New Panama Canal Company. Moreover, the dam which we are proposing to build is of the same type of dam which the French had in contemplation—an earth dam. It is true that this is to be lined with a concrete core for some distance above its foundation, but, as stated by Admiral Walker in his testimony, this is for the purpose of preventing seepage of water and not with a view of strengthening the dam.

Another material difference between the International Commission and ours is concerning the extent to which it may be necessary to care for surplus water in flood season. The first-named commission deemed that reservoirs must be formed having a storage capacity of 8,829,000,000 cubic feet. It says on that point:

The greatest known freshet may be assumed as having produced at Bohio at the time of its maximum, a discharge of about 3,000 cubic meters (105,000 cubic feet) per second. It is admitted that it is safe to allow the escape, through the overflow weirs of the Bohio Reservoir, to the right and to the left of the canal, a total volume of 1,200 cubic meters (42,380 cubic feet) per second.

The estimates that may be made of the régime of the freshet under consideration lead us to assume that the time during which the output was greater than 1,200 cubic meters (42,380 cubic feet) was about forty-eight hours, and that the mean output during that time was 2,600 cubic meters (91,800 cubic feet) per second. The volume to be impounded would then be 1,400 cubic meters (49,400 cubic feet) per second during forty-eight hours, or 242,000,000 cubic meters (8,546 million cubic feet); say 250,000,000 cubic meters (8,829 million cubic feet). A flood of that magnitude at Bohio can take place only in the event of the determining climatic conditions acting with intensity over the entire watershed, and we can estimate, from a study of the data at hand, that in that case 52 per cent of the total output admitted at Bohio would come from the portion of the watershed above Alajuela; this gives for the considered period of forty-eight hours an output of 234,000,000 cubic meters (8,264 million cubic feet) coming from the upper region. It will then be always possible to retain in the Alajuela Reservoir 100,000,000 cubic meters (3,532 million cubic feet) or 150,000,000 cubic meters(5,297 million cubic feet), in accordance with whichever of the above plans is adopted. The regulation of the Chagres freshets is therefore absolutely insured by the arrangements just described.

Our Commission, it will be seen from the extract from its report heretofore quoted, estimate the storage capacity of Lake Bohio at only 5,680,000,000 cubic feet, and makes no provisions other than that furnished by Lake Bohio for caring for or storing the surplus water.

Mr. President, I do not know which of these eminent commissions is right, nor, I imagine, do many members of this Senate. I do know, however, that with a safe and feasible project immediately under our hand, which will cost less than Panama, and which will answer all our purposes better, it would be the height of folly to take on ourselves the possibility of danger and disaster involved in the latter project. We have some experience in Congress with engineers' estimates. Very few of them are within limits and many projects favorably reported on require to be modified and recast at large increase of cost. Such, I venture to say, will be necessary with this one if we take over from our French friends the Panama derelict. We will in time come to the well-considered scheme of the international commission for two lakes, one at Alajuela and one at Bohio, for a dam at the latter place with an elevation of only 67.3 feet, and with a consequent deepening of the Culebra cut to a depth of 32.8 feet above sea level. The cost, approximately, will be $50,000,000.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the criticism of Mr. Charles T. Harvey, the eminent engineer who designed and constructed the St. Marys Canal, upon the plans of the Isthmian Commission as outlined in its report. I read from a letter of date March 29, 1902, written by that gentleman to Senator MORGAN, and forming a part of Senate Document No. 303 of the present session:

Under this caption the most fundamental points of difference between the "P" and "N" routes come under review. In the case of the former, the original plans of Count De Lesseps had the merit of minimizing the risks of serious breaks in the canal proper, except such as might arise in the problem of controlling the Chagres River, but the plans of the new company include the creating of a high-level artificial lake, of some 43 square miles area, by the interposition of a dam 2,546 feet long, 228 feet high above bed rock, so far as latter has been found by boring—the whole to be of earth, except a narrow masonry core intended more to prevent seepage than to prevent superlateral resistance—to the rear water pressure. Three dangers might each cause the overthrow of this structure: First, percolation under its base; second, the sudden bursting of restraining reservoir dams farther up in the Chagres River Valley; third, seismic disturbances in that locality.

The first two may be averted by engineering skill and unlimited expense, but the latter is beyond human prevention, and this, it seems, is a local menace with startling recent proofs of pendency. The report of the Canal Commission, page 168, reads as follows:

"For Panama the records show 28 earthquakes. Of these, 12 occurred in the three years 1882-1884. During the earthquake of September 7, 1882, a part of the cathedral at Panama was thrown down, and the headquarters building of the canal company was cracked. The railroad had its tracks and roadbed in places thrown out of line, and the masonry of three or four bridges and culverts were damaged. At Los Cruces the church was thrown down; at Colon some lives were lost and crevasses were opened, and the Jamaica telegraph line was broken."

To this Mr. Haupt adds in his evidence (p. 551) that in 1882 Colon was rent with a seam across the town and the railroad bridge at Barbacoa was shifted out of position.

These points being in the vicinity of the proposed dam, the extraordinary risk to its permanency is at once apparent. Should it give way, the eastern section of the canal would be obliterated with a roar and a rush awful beyond description. Not a person between it and Colon would probably be left alive to tell the tale, and ships in the canal might be buried out of sight by the débris or hurled as shapeless wrecks into the ocean.

Having been in the vicinity of the Johnstown dam disaster, and having witnessed the devastation caused by the concurrent breaking of a series of reservoir dams in the Lehigh River Valley, where I have seen canal boats carried out of the canal near the river and landed miles away from its line, with the crew drowned in the flood, I have a very acute dread of such catastrophies from actual observation of their effects.

These occurred in the heart of the old State of Pennsylvania, with engineering ability of the highest grade near at hand. How much greater the danger from like causes in the almost unknown recesses of Panama!

I have examined the testimony of Messrs. Haupt and Plume, in their recent evidence, and in view of the facts they state as to the treacherous nature of the main strata in the vicinity to be relied upon for dam foundations, and the imperfect result of the examination of the same by the French engineering corps, my conclusion is that the risk incident to that feature of the "P" route is one that the United States can not afford to assume, much less any contracting syndicate or individual; and for myself, I would not, under any probable circumstances, be willing to be connected with it professionally or otherwise. The risk is beyond human assurance, and therefore too great. This conclusion renders consideration of various other difficulties inherent to the "P" route superfluous.

Mr. President, I pass now from financial and engineering problems, concerning which I confess I know but little, to those concerning which I know more, or with which, at least, I am more familiar. I maintain that it is not possible for us to acquire an indefeasible title to the Panama Canal within any reasonable time or for any reasonable sum of money unless the judicial system of France is more remarkable than even the Dreyfus trial would lead one to suppose it to be. We may assume, I imagine, that the fundamental basis of all judicial systems is the administration of natural right and natural justice. If the stockholders and bondholders of the old Panama Canal Company can be cut off by any court in France from the right to insist that the New Panama Canal Company shall go on and complete its contract, made for their benefit, to construct the Panama Canal, and to operate it, and to pay to the liquidator of the old company, for their benefit, 60 per cent of the net proceeds of operation, then the judicial system of France is not founded on right and justice, but upon wrong and injustice. And this right has been cut off, it is said, by an order of a court of first instance, corresponding to our courts of ordinary superior jurisdiction, made in advance of a sale, without notice to bondholders and stockholders, authorizing a sale without limitation as to price and without any showing whatever as to the necessity or propriety of a sale.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg leave to suggest that the sale was required to be made to a sole purchaser—the United States. No other purchaser is permitted to purchase the property.

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAY. I beg to interrupt the Senator from Washington to say that if I catch his idea it is this: The old Panama Company was composed of seven or eight hundred thousand stockholders.

Mr. MORGAN. Stockholders and bondholders.

Mr. CLAY. Stockholders and bondholders. They had a charter from the French Government, as I understand the Senator. The old company, after having expended about $260,000,000, completed about one-fifth of the canal, and then the old company failed in business. The new company became the purchaser of the rights, privileges, and franchises of the old company. As I understand the Senator, they agreed in a contract to carry out the terms of the charter of the old company, and not only to complete the canal, but after it was completed they agreed then to pay to the stockholders and bondholders of the old company 60 per cent of their net profits.

I understand that the new company agreed to be bound—in fact, they were bound and are bound—by the terms and conditions of the charter granted to the old company. Now, I understand the Senator's position to be simply this: That if we buy the rights, privileges, and franchises of the new company, we are bound to carry out its contract with the old canal company.

Mr. TURNER. The statement of the Senator from Georgia is substantially correct.

Mr. CLAY. In reading the report (and I have read both reports with a great deal of interest) I understand that the charter granted to the old Panama Company provided that all of the machinery used in the construction of the canal should be purchased in France, and all of the raw material used in the construction of the canal should be purchased in France. My understanding is that the new canal company accepted the same terms and conditions in regard to the construction of the canal.

Mr. MORGAN. That was the condition imposed upon the old canal company and the new canal company by an act of the Parliament of France when they were permitted to enter into what was called the "lottery bond scheme."

Mr. CLAY. Then, I will ask the Senator if it is not true that if we buy the charter and all other rights and privileges of the new canal company the stockholders in the old canal company, saying that the new company owes them certain rights and that they took this property in trust for the purpose of carrying out those rights, and if we accept their privileges and franchises, knowing these facts, would not the Government of the United States be bound in equity to carry out all the terms of the contract with the old company?

Mr. MORGAN. It would be not only bound in equity, but bound in law. However, I will not undertake to explain that, because I am satisfied the Senator from Washington will go over the whole ground.

Mr. CLAY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. TURNER. I think the Senator from Georgia is entirely correct in his statements.

Speaking of the charter to which I have just referred, a more remarkable exercise of power, unrestrained by any of the safeguards which every judicial system attempts to throw around private right, was never exhibited in any country. It can not possibly stand as a proper and sufficient order in any appellate tribunal, and there are several such in France to which it may be appealed, while there are half a million stockholders and bondholders of the old company qualified to become actors in such appellate proceedings, and, unless very different from the men of other countries, ready and willing and only waiting for the necessity to take such action.

When the old Panama Canal Company, under the control of De Lesseps, failed, the company was forced into liquidation and came under the control of the civil tribunal, lower court, for the department of the Seine, sitting at Paris, which court appointed a liquidator for the company, and also a liquidator for the bondholders. The powers and duties of a liquidator under the French laws are understood to be very much the same as those which belong to a receiver under our system, but if so the necessity for two separate liquidators is not apparent. However, that is not material to the proposition which I have in mind. The liquidator of the old company, under the direction of the court, took possession of the books, papers, assets, and property of the company, and to the best of his ability cared for and preserved them. The bonded indebtedness was about 850,000,000 francs, and the paid-up stock subscription represented about 400,000,000 francs.

The company owed a considerable sum which was not secured, but was possessed of money and choses in action more than sufficient to meet all indebtedness, and was likewise possessed of the Panama Canal concession and the uncompleted canal, and everything pertaining thereto, including construction plant, lands, and buildings, and the Panama Railroad. The old company being hopelessly insolvent and the entire property in danger of destruction by the lapse of its concessionary rights at Panama, a new corporation was formed to take over the property and complete the canal, called the "Compagnie Nouvelle du Canal de Panama."

Mr. MORGAN. That is the present company.

Mr. TURNER. The present company, and the liquidator of the old company, acting by authority of the court, subscribed to the money capital of the new company and also contributed to the new company the uncompleted canal at Panama and everything pertaining thereto. This contribution and the obligations flowing therefrom were made a part of the articles of the new corporation, thus evidencing the contract in the highest form and making its full and complete execution one of the objects of the incorporation and rendering the new corporation a trustee for the benefit of the bondholders and stockholders of the old company.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to state right there, as I see he has not the figures, that the subscriptions to the New Panama Canal Company are 65,000,000 francs, and of that sum the liquidator, representing the old company, took 17,000,000 francs of stock in the new company.

Mr. TURNER. This contribution and the obligation thereby created are thus declared by article 3 of the charter of the new company:

ARTICLE 3.

Mr. Jean Pierre Gautron, a judicial administrator near the civil tribunal of the Seine, residing in Paris, Rue Tronchet, No. 13, "acting in the name and as sole liquidator of the 'Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique de Panama,' under the powers conferred by a judgment of the civil tribunal of the Seine under date of February, 1889," has intervened in these presents:

Mr. Gautron appointed to the said office of liquidator by a judgment of the council chamber of the civil tribunal of the Seine dated July 21, 1898, who, in his above said capacity, brings to the corporation—

First. All rights whatever accruing to the company in liquidation by virtue of the laws of the Government of the United States of Colombia, under dates of May 18, 1878, and December 26, 1890, as well as of the decrees, acts, or matters that have taken place since in the operation of those laws, with all the advantages stipulated in said laws and decrees, together with all the lands and real estate granted to the Interoceanic Company in liquidation or acquired by the said company.

All of which on condition that the provisions of the laws and extensions of the concessions shall be complied with and that all outstanding debts of the liquidation to the Colombian Government shall be discharged.

Second. The completed works, yards, workshops, buildings, hospitals, equipment whether set up or not, materials and supplies, etc., belonging to the "Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique" in liquidation, as well as all securities that may have been deposited by the said company in liquidation.

Third. The plans, estimates, surveys, documents of all kinds collected by the "Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique" and having any connection whatever with the survey, construction, or operation of the canal or of its owners, as well as the benefit of all contracts with third parties.

Fourth. All rights of every nature, shares in ownership, and others, of every and whatsoever kind, that may belong to the "Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique" in liquidation in the Panama Colon Railway, operated by an American company styled the "Panama Railroad Company," whose principal office is in New York, these rights being transferred such as they stand and exist, and Mr. Gautron, in his capacity, binding himself to vest this corporation therewith in the form required by the law of the United States of America.

These rights and property such as they stand and exist and in the condition in which they are.

The present corporation shall become owner of the property and rights hereby ceded and contributed on and from the day when it shall have been finally constituted; except, however, what is to be stated hereinafter in regard to the Panama Railroad.

These cessions and contributions are made by Mr. Gautron under the following reservations and provisions, namely:

First. There shall be allotted to the liquidation a share of 60 per cent in the net profits of the undertaking, such profits to be determined in accordance with articles 51 and 52 hereinbelow.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator thinks we would have to pay 60 per cent——

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; I think so.

Mr. CLAY. If we buy their charter?

Mr. TURNER. Yes.

Second. There shall be set apart for the Government of the United States of Colombia, in conformity to the extension law of December 26, 1890, 50,000 of the shares hereby created, said shares to be free from all liabilities.

Third. The rights of every nature on the Panama Railroad belonging to the liquidation and contributed by Mr. Gautron under section 4 of this article shall become vested in the present corporation from the day of the meeting, the convening of which is provided for under article 75 hereinafter, without any pecuniary consideration, but under the resolutory proviso that the canal shall be completed within the time stipulated in the act of concession. Should the canal not be completed within the said time, the said rights would revert to the liquidation.

If, contrary to expectation, the above-mentioned meeting should not make the requisite provisions for the completion of the canal, or, if the provisions made by the meeting could not be carried out, the said rights on the railroad would remain the property of the present corporation, but the latter would be held to pay to the liquidation a sum of 20,000,000 of francs by way of indemnity, and the share in the profits allotted to the liquidation would be one-half of the profits of the present corporation, and no amount shall be set aside out of such profits except those provided for in paragraphs 2 and 3 of article 51, hereinafter.

In consequence the said rights shall remain inalienable in the possession of the new company until the said sum of 20,000,000 shall have been paid, or until the canal shall have been entirely completed.

Fourth. Until the final completion of the canal Mr. Gautron, in his name, shall have the faculty of appointing a supervising committee consisting of three members selected, as far as practicable, among the Government engineers for bridges and highways and treasury inspectors, who will look into the progress of the work, the condition and conservancy of the equipment and buildings, as well as the books appertaining thereto.

The compensation of this committee shall be charged to the new company.

Articles 51 and 52, referred to in the foregoing article, read as follows:

ARTICLE 51.

The annual proceeds of the enterprise are to be first used in satisfying—

First. The participation stipulated by the Government of the United States of Colombia for its benefit, under the provisions of the concession law.

Second. The expenses of maintenance and operation, the costs of management, and generally all corporate charges; the interest and amortization of all loans that may have been contracted.

Third. The setting aside of one-twentieth of the net profits, after meeting all the above-mentioned liabilities, for the purpose of establishing the reserve fund required by law.

Fourth. Five per cent of the corporate stock, the proceeds of which shall be appropriated by the general meeting, on the motion of the board of directors, for the creation of a sinking fund which shall be provided for in article 55 hereinafter, and also for the payment of interest on unredeemed shares.

ARTICLE 52.

The surplus of the annual proceeds, after the various deductions provided for in the foregoing article, shall constitute the net proceeds or profits of the enterprise.

Five per cent of such profits shall be set aside for the benefit of the board of directors of the corporation.

The remainder shall be apportioned as follows:

Up to 40 per cent to the shares in existence;

And up to 60 per cent to the "Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique" in liquidation.

The new company, organized under this arrangement, took possession of the property, procured extensions of the concessions, and has prosecuted the construction of the Panama canal, and is doing so at this moment, and it declared to the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, through its secretary and representative here, Mr. Edward Lampre, only a few weeks ago, that it was a solvent, going concern, capable of completing the canal, and expecting to do so if it did not make a sale to the United States. It does not require a profound knowledge of the jurisprudence of France to enable one to say that, on this state of facts, the laws of that country do not give the Compagnie Nouvelle the unrestricted right to sell the canal for any sum that it pleases, as claimed by Mr. Lampre, or that the broad order of the court of first instance in the liquidation proceedings, being appealable, is not worth the paper it is written on in the higher courts of France.

I have made no special study of the jurisprudence of France, but I know from my elementary reading that, like our system of equity jurisprudence, it is founded on the civil law, has the same conception of trust obligations, and works them out and protects them in much the same manner. Here we have two trusts for the benefit of the old Panama Canal Company—its creditors and its shareholders. One, the liquidation, which is being carried on under the immediate eye of the court; the other, declared by the Compagnie Nouvelle in its charter, and which any court of equity in this country, on the application of any party in interest, would enforce, and which there must be tribunals in France armed with the power to enforce.

Mr. MORGAN. To prevent any possible misapprehension in the statement from the omission the Senator has made, I should like to say that the shares in the old Panama Canal Company bore interest from the date of subscription, or from the date they were paid up, at the rate of 5 per cent, and the bonds bore from 5 down to 3 per cent, according to the circumstances of their issue.

Mr. TURNER. Yes. It is claimed by the representative of the new company now in this country that the legal title to the property, full, complete, and without limitation or condition, is in his company, and that it can dispose of it as it pleases and confer perfect title without power in the courts of France to interfere. Such, I am quite certain, would not be the law under our judicial system.

The old company and the stockholders and bondholders of the old company would be declared to have an equitable right and title in the property of which they could not be divested without their consent. It is impossible to conceive that they have not an equivalent right under the laws of France, although it may not there be called an equitable title. If the new company were itself bankrupt and unable to carry out its contract for the benefit of the old company, and the security of the old company was thereby endangered, different principles would then apply. In that case a sale of the property might be properly ordered as the only thing which would protect the creditors and stockholders of the old company; but it would be ordered for the sole and exclusive benefit of the old company and its cestuis qui trustent, and the new company, which had confessedly failed in its contract and was endangering the property by its failure, would have no standing whatever to come in as a beneficiary.

But this is not the attitude of the parties. The new company is a going concern, claims to be able to complete the canal, and is even now working to that end. It would be a monstrous judicial system, with injustice as its purpose and unreason as its guide, which would permit that company, solvent and sound as it claims to be, at its own will and pleasure, and for such consideration as it chooses to accept, to disable itself from carrying out its solemn obligation for the benefit of the old company entered into when it took over the property of that company. That property represented an expenditure of $250,000,000, and the parties must have contemplated that it was worth something in the neighborhood of that amount. They must have contemplated that the new company would spend in the completion of the canal somewhere in the neighborhood of $150,000,000 more. They must have thought that the canal when completed would be worth at least $250,000,000, and that it would pay fair returns on that capitalization.

It is not unfair for us to assume now that the completed canal would be worth $250,000,000, and that it would pay fair dividends on that sum of money. Such dividends applied fairly to the stock and the bonds of the old company would give them both large value. It must have been in contemplation of such results that the old company turned its property over to the new company. How is it possible, then, under any system of law, that the new company, still able to complete the canal, still proceeding diligently in that direction, can be permitted to throw up its hands and dispose of the trust property committed to it for a sum no part of which can, by any possibility, reach the stockholders of the old company, and which, spread out among the bondholders, will give them but an insignificant moiety of what they have a right to expect, and what they would in fact receive, if the canal were completed?

I wish now to call the attention of the Senate to the manner in which these valuable rights of the old company and its beneficiaries have been dealt with by the lower court of the Seine. I read the petition and order of the court under which the offer was made to sell the Panama Canal to the United States for $40,000,000.

I beg to detain the Senate again while I read this order of the court in full, because it is upon this order that the new company predicates its right to sell the canal to us for $40,000,000:

[Translation.]

Extract of the minutes of the clerk of the civil tribunal of first instance of the department of the Seine, sitting at the Palace of Justice, Paris.

The civil tribunal of first instance of the department of the Seine, in session in the Palace of Justice in Paris, rendered in the chamber of the council the decision the tenor o' which is as follows:

The tribunal assembled in the chamber of the council in view: First, of the request presented by Gautron in his official capacity, signed by Biéville, attorney, and the tenor of which is as follows:

To Messrs. the president and judges composing the chamber of the council of the civil tribunal of the Seine:

Mr. P. Gautron, liquidator of the Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique de Panama, residing at the seat of the liquidation, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin No. 42, Mr. Biéville, acting as his attorney, has the honor to state to you that the judgment of the civil tribunal of the Seine, dated February 4, 1889, which declared the dissolution and the placing in liquidation of the Société du Canal Interocéanique de Panama, had appointed Mr. Joseph Brunet as liquidator of the said company, with the most extended powers, especially to cede or contribute to any new company all or part of the corporate assets, to make or ratify with the contractors of the Panama Canal all agreements for the purpose of insuring the continuation of the works and of contracting loans and furnishing all guarantees thereto.

That the tribunal said that in case of the disability of the appointed liquidator his place should be filled by the usual methods.

That it thereupon authorized him to solicit in the same way all special powers which should be necessary for the fulfillment of his mission, and, if he judged it useful, the addition of one or more liquidators.

That Mr. Achille Monchicourt was named assistant liquidator of the Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique de Panama by the judgment of the chamber of the council dated February 13, 1890.

That after the resignation of Mr. Brunet, Mr. Achille Monchicourt solicited and obtained the addition of Mr. Gautron, joint liquidator, by the terms of a judgment of the chamber of the council of July 21, 1893.

That in consequence of the death of Mr. Achille Monchicourt Mr. Gautron remained the sole liquidator.

That the liquidation of the Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique de Panama is at this moment confronted with negotiations entered into by the Compagnie Nouvelle du Canal de Panama with the Government of the United States of North America and with the eventuality of the transfer of the concession and canal works either to the Government of the United States or to a foreign company.

That this transfer could not be validly made by the new company, except with the concurrence and assent of the liquidation of the Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique de Panama and of the representative of the bondholders and creditors of the liquidation.

That the liquidation may find itself in disaccord with the Compagnie Nouvelle as to the price to be asked or the conditions to be proposed to the eventual purchaser.

That there exists a difference of interests between the liquidation and the new company upon the subject of a division of the proceeds of said transfer.

That an immediate discussion might bring about no result and would be of a nature to injure the result of negotiations pending with an eventual purchaser.

That it is essential to submit the questions in dispute, which may arise, to the decree of amicable arbitrators charged with deciding all questions relating to—

Firstly. The determination of the price and the conditions to be proposed to the eventual purchaser.

Secondly. The division of the proceeds of the sale, should such sale be effected.

That the right of liquidators of companies to compromise is contested by certain legal authorities as exceeding acts of their administration.

That it is therefore necessary to solicit from the tribunal the authority of Mr. Gautron to consent to an arrangement, under the circumstances above stated, and in the case of a sale of the concession and the canal works as well as all of the assets of the Compagnie Nouvelle.

Wherefore the petitioner prays that it may please the President and judges to authorize him, in his capacity of liquidator of the Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique de Panama, to pass an agreement with the Compagnie Nouvelle du Canal de Panama upon all matters of dispute which may arise in connection with

Firstly. The determination of the price and the conditions to be proposed to the eventual purchaser of the concession and canal works and all the assets of the new company.

Secondly. The division of the proceeds of the sale between the new company and the liquidation of the Panama Canal Company, should such sale be effected.

Under all reserves.

And this will be justice.

DE BIÉVILLE.

In view, secondly, of the decree of the president of the tribunal being as follows: The above request shall be communicated to the attorney for the Republic in his office, and we appoint Vice-President Laporte to make his report.

Paris, July 31, 1901.

BAUDOUIN.

In view, thirdly, of the conclusions of the attorney for the Republic, which are as follows: The attorney for the Republic does not object.

Rendered in the attorney's office, August 2, 1901.

PEZOUS.

In view, fourthly, of the various documents submitted.

Having heard Vice-President Laporte, in his report, the attorney for the Republic in his conclusions, and after having deliberated in conformity with law, judging in first instance:

Whereas by a judgment of this Chamber, dated July 21, 1893, Achille Monchicourt petitioned for and obtained the addition of Gautron as coliquidator of the Compagnie Interocéanique de Panama;

Whereas in consequence of the death of Achille Monchicourt, Gautron remained the only liquidator; whereas, from the documents submitted, it appears that it is necessary to authorize Gautron to consent to a compromise in compliance with his request.

For these reasons:

Authorizes Gautron, in his official capacity, to consent to a compromise with the Nouvelle Compagnie du Canal de Panama upon all litigious questions which might arise relating—

Firstly. To the determination of the price and the conditions to be proposed to the eventual purchaser of the concession and the canal works, and all the assets of the new company.

Secondly. To the division of the proceeds of the sale, if that sale should be effected, between the new company and the liquidation of the Panama Canal.

LAPORTE, LE BERQUIÉR, and FLOQUET.

Ordered and decreed in the chamber of the council of the civil tribunal of the first instance of the department of the Seine, sitting in the palace of justice, in the city of Paris, by Laporte, president; Berquiér, judge; Planchenault, special judge, in the presence of Mr. Pezous, substitute for the attorney for the Republic, assisted by Floquet, clerk.

August 2, 1901.

In consequence, etc.:

The minute was signed by the president, the reporting judge, and the clerk.

Recorded at Paris, the 19th of August, 1901, folio 94.

Division first, received 9 francs, 38 centimes, decimes included.

VARINOT.

A true copy.

FLOQUET.

Mr. President, it will be seen that no fact was presented to the court as the basis for its order which, consistently with the principles I have been discussing, could justify the court in making it. The order was founded on the bare, naked statement of the petition that the new company was negotiating a sale of the property to the United States, that a sale could not be legally consummated without the concurrence and assent of the liquidator, and that the order of the court was necessary to authorize the liquidator to consent.

There was no statement that the new company was insolvent, that it could not complete the building of the canal, that it was endangering the property held by it for the benefit, in part, of the old company, or that a sale of the property was the only way or the most satisfactory way in which the remnant left could be preserved for the benefit of those entitled to share in its distribution. Nothing of the kind. The petition proceeded on the remarkable theory of Mr. Lampre, declared before the Senate committee here, that the new company ought to be and was entitled to be relieved at its pleasure of its obligations to the old company, and that it was not even compelled to make full restitution to the old company of what it had received from that company, but was entitled to a share of the sum which it might receive on a sale of the property. The lower French court accepted this theory, and not only authorized the sale, but directed an arbitration to determine the extent to which the new company might share in the results of its own misfeasance, malfeasance, and breach of trust. A more remarkable and indefensible judicial order was never made. It carries on its face its own insufficiency. It is impossible that it can stand on an appeal to the higher courts.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the Senator whether or not the stockholders of the old company were parties to this proceeding?

Mr. TURNER. Certainly not. None of them was present in court.

Mr. CLAY. Would a decree of that sort have any effect within the law?

Mr. TURNER. I should say not.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. TURNER. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Is there anything in the French law that tolerates such a proceeding?

Mr. TURNER. I should certainly think there can not be.

Mr. STEWART. I have not met with anyone who has examined the French law with regard to that question. The proceeding was very anomalous.

Mr. TURNER. Certainly, it was a very anomalous proceeding.

Mr. MORGAN. There is one fact I should like to call to the attention of the Senator from Washington, and that is that quite a number of these bonds, particularly the lottery bonds, are held by citizens of the United States—women and children and the estates of dead men, who were never represented in that court in any sense of the word—and those bonds are held here now. The committee have received letters—at least I have—from persons who represent those people, stating that they are holders of large numbers of these bonds and wanting to know what we were going to do about them. I do not know.

Mr. TURNER. It is impossible, moreover, to conceive that there is not one out of the 200,000 stockholders in France, thus cut out of any possible reimbursement, or one out of the like number of bondholders, thus defeated in their just expectations, who will not feel justified in prosecuting an appeal from the order. It seems manifest, then, that we can not get title to the Panama Canal as the result of the present offer, based as it is on the irregular and insufficient order of sale made by the lower court of the Seine. And it is equally manifest that upon the facts held out by the new company, to wit, that it is solvent and capable of completing the canal, no order can ever be made by any court of France without the concurrence of each individual stockholder and bondholder of the old company, which can authorize the new company to sell the canal to the United States or to any other purchaser.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. TURNER. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If I may interrupt the Senator—I am not as familiar with the record as he is, he being a member of the committee which has had under consideration this important subject, and I inquire merely for information—I should like to ask the Senator whether that remarkable and irregular order, to which he refers, has been appealed from by any of the creditors?

Mr. TURNER. I am not aware that it has been, but I understand that the proceeding is still pending. If there shall be a sale under that order, it will be necessary to go into court for confirmation of the sale. If there be such a confirmation by the lower court, then an appeal would lie.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. TURNER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senator if the old stockholders were interested in having this contract carried out, could this new company file a petition and violate the principles of the agreement between the old and the new company and dispose of the interest of the old company without the old company being made a party? Has any such proceeding ever been heard of in law?

Mr. TURNER. That is what the company is claiming. I do not think there is any such system of jurisprudence in existence anywhere in the world.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask the Senator further whether or not there was not a confirmation of just such an order of sale?

Mr. TURNER. A confirmation of this order of sale?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Yes.

Mr. TURNER. Not that I have ever been informed of. There is certainly nothing in the record to indicate anything of that kind. The fact is, there has been no sale, and there could have been no confirmation of a sale until a sale had taken place.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the point.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. But there was a sale of the old property to the new company.

Mr. TURNER. That was in 1891, and that was a fair, equitable, and just arrangement; the only arrangement that could save the old company anything, and the court did confirm that sale, of course. Otherwise the new company would not have this property to offer to us.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. There was no appeal from that?

Mr. TURNER. No.

It is of little value to speculate concerning what might be done if the New Panama Canal Company were to confess itself insolvent, go into court and surrender the property, and permit the court to make the most advantageous disposal of it possible for the benefit of those to whom it belongs in equity and good conscience. It is not doing anything of that kind, and does not propose anything of that kind, and therefore the only thing left for us to do is to consider its offer in the light of conditions as we find them—conditions which it has no disposition or purpose to change.

I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to parts of the testimony of M. Lampre, the secretary of the New Panama Canal Company, given before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, for the purpose of showing the position taken by that company concerning its rights and powers in connection with the sale of this property:

The CHAIRMAN. What were to be the terms of the sale?

M. LAMPRE. Forty million dollars, covering every property of the company.

The CHAIRMAN. When payable?

M. LAMPRE. Nothing has been said as to the payment to the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. That is entirely indefinite?

M. LAMPRE. Entirely indefinite, according to what steps will be taken here.

The CHAIRMAN. That term being left indefinite, it would probably require some negotiations hereafter to arrange the period of the payment and to advise us on that point?

M. LAMPRE. Most likely.

The CHAIRMAN. You spoke of the copy being left with the American ambassador in Paris.

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that left as an official paper?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly; signed by the president of the board.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the president of the company have the authority of the Government of France to deposit that official paper?

M. LAMPRE. Not from the Government of France, but he has full authority from the stockholders' meeting, which was held on the 21st of December last. We had a stockholders' meeting then, and the stockholders' meeting approved of a resolution for the company to negotiate with the United States Government.

The CHAIRMAN. I was speaking of the Government of France.

M. LAMPRE. The Government of France has nothing to do with the question at all. We have a private company bound in no way whatever with the Government of France, only bound to act under the laws of the country, and the laws of the country are that whatever step a private corporation takes it is well and good when confirmed and approved of by the stockholders' meeting.

The CHAIRMAN. Whatever they choose to do they can do if the stockholders' meeting approves it?

M. LAMPRE. Quite so.

The CHAIRMAN. That is your idea of the laws of France?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly.

The following is from the same document, pages 17, 18, and 19:

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Let me see if I understand exactly the transaction between the old and the new company. I understand that the old company went into liquidation and a liquidator was appointed.

M. LAMPRE. Exactly.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Of course he represents the stockholders, creditors, and bondholders?

M. LAMPRE. That is right.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Representing these parties, he transferred all the right, title, interest, and property of the old concern to your company, and that was duly ratified and homologated by the judgment of the court?

M. LAMPRE. That is the whole subject, sir.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. As the consideration of the transfer, your company was to pay to the liquidator, representing the creditors, bondholders, stockholders, and shareholders, 60 per cent of the benefits of the canal?

M. LAMPRE. That is correct.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Then your company purposes to transfer all your right, title, and interest to this Government for, say, $40,000,000?

M. LAMPRE. Yes.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Now, what guaranty will your company give, in the event of the purchase of the canal by this Government, that the 60 per cent of benefits which the old company was to derive as a consideration will not be a part of the obligation which this Government assumes?

M. LAMPRE. I understand the question.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. I tried to make it clear.

M. LAMPRE. The guaranty we will give is that very agreement I was just telling you about, according to which the liquidator and the old company accept of the question to be settled, the division of the amount each might get to be settled by a board of arbitration. To my understanding, the division of the amount we might get from the United States has nothing to do with the United States itself. I beg pardon, if I am too crude.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. We think you are perfectly clear.

M. LAMPRE. It is a matter to be settled only and exclusively between the liquidator and our own company. It is settled under the present agreement.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Under your law, has not any creditor or bondholder or any holder of stock the right to go into court and object to any settlement that the liquidator might make?

M. LAMPRE. The liquidator has authority.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. The liquidator, as I understand, has authority, or you have authority, to make this arbitration.

M. LAMPRE. He has authority from the court.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. Under your law, does not his act require a homologation by the court?

M. LAMPRE. I understand your question, Senator. But that thing has been foreseen, and there is at the present time a judgment of the court giving the liquidator that very authority to enter upon that contract, agreement, with the new company, so that the thing is quite clear and certain now. He has got a special judgment, special authority and authorization from the court to enter upon a contract with us.

Senator FOSTER of Louisiana. To enter upon this arbitration?

M. LAMPRE. An arbitration contract, an agreement, under which we alone would have to deal with the United States.

Senator TURNER. What court is that?

M. LAMPRE. The French court.

Senator TURNER. What is the rank of the court? Is it a court of last resort, or is its judgments subject to review by other courts?

M. LAMPRE. The first court.

Senator TURNER. A court of first instance?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly.

Senator TURNER. Then its judgment is subject to review if any stockholder wills to open it up?

M. LAMPRE. It might be, but I do not expect any trouble from that source.

Senator TURNER. Now, let me ask you this question: When you took this canal project over from the liquidator, was it a contract to complete the canal and operate it?

M. LAMPRE. Yes; that was the contract.

Senator TURNER. And to turn over to the old stockholders 60 per cent of the net proceeds?

M. LAMPRE. It was.

Senator TURNER. That was your contract?

M. LAMPRE. It was.

Senator TURNER. If the bonded indebtedness amounts to 800,000,000 francs or more, there would be none of this $40,000,000 to turn over to the old stockholders at all, that being the first lien, of course?

M. LAMPRE. This is how the thing stands: The stockholders, as I said——

Senator TURNER. The stockholders would be out and injured?

M. LAMPRE. That is a matter for the liquidator to decide.

Senator TURNER. Would they have a standing in some court to come in and say that the liquidator had no authority to contract to turn over this property to a foreign government and cut them out from the possibility of any benefits whatever from the construction and operation of this canal?

M. LAMPRE. Well, you know any claim may always be set forth, but I am convinced——

Senator TURNER. Is it not quite likely that they would urge a claim of that kind?

M. LAMPRE. It might happen, but I am convinced there would be no difficulty about it at all under these conditions.

Senator TURNER. What right would any court have, in justice and equity, to cut these old stockholders out of any possibility of any benefit?

M. LAMPRE. The law itself, sir; because it is the law in France that when a corporation fails the first interests in that corporation to satisfy are the interests of the bondholders. The stockholders, who are only associates, who are debtors to the bondholders, have no right to get anything unless the bondholders are completely disinterested.

Senator TURNER. I understand that; but having failed, the liquidator, in the interest of the stockholders as well as the bondholders, made this contract with the new company. Now, what right has any court to say to that liquidator, "You may make a contract which will cut these stockholders off from any possibility of any benefits whatever?"

M. LAMPRE. The law itself.

Senator TURNER. Does the law give them that right absolutely?

M. LAMPRE. Yes.

Senator TURNER. Without any compensation or consideration to them whatever?

M. LAMPRE. Quite so.

The following is from the same document, pages 22, 23, 24, 25, and 26:

The CHAIRMAN. The object of the Panama Canal Company—the new company—according to its by-laws, and according to its charter, according to all of its professions here, was to build and complete that canal.

M. LAMPRE. It was.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the present object?

M. LAMPRE. It is still the object; but at the present time the object is the sale or transfer to the United States. That is what we contemplate at the present time, but, this failing, of course the object of the company stands.

The CHAIRMAN. You know the internal workings of this company. When they set forth to form the new organization to build a lock canal instead of the old sea-level canal, was it or was it not the purpose of the company really to build a canal, or was it to make a show in regard to the property by which and through which they could sell it to somebody else?

M. LAMPRE. No, sir; the honest, clear, straightforward, and clean purpose was to build the canal.

The CHAIRMAN. This agreement, then, between the liquidator and the new company, and this judgment of the court transferring the property to them, was for that purpose, was it not?

M. LAMPRE. Yes; for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any purpose at that time, either expressed or implied or understood, that this new company was formed for the purpose of getting hold of that property to sell it to somebody else?

M. LAMPRE. No; the object of the company at that time was to complete the canal; but I must state that in the charters, or by-laws, as I would say, for private corporations it is always contemplated that at any time the corporation may sell out to anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. That is your judgment about it. I want to get at facts—just the square, naked facts.

M. LAMPRE. Will you please repeat the question?

The CHAIRMAN. We form our own judgment about what the facts amount to, and we try to do it properly and correctly. We have a right to our judgment upon the facts, not to accept yours absolutely.

M. LAMPRE. Oh, yes; I do not presume it.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, I want to know if it was the purpose of your company as you have stated it here.

M. LAMPRE. The purpose was to build the canal.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand you to go upon the idea (if I am incorrect about it you can correct me) that under the power of this charter and by-laws your corporation has a right to do anything with this property that it is not prohibited from doing.

M. LAMPRE. That is it.

The CHAIRMAN. That is your view?

M. LAMPRE. That is the very thing. That is the law under which we act.

The CHAIRMAN. That is so strange to us that we shall be obliged to take some time to consider it before we come to that conclusion.

M. LAMPRE. It is quite a different thing, I understand, in the United States.

Senator MITCHELL. You understand that there was this difference in the law heretofore?

M. LAMPRE. Yes; I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. So you claim now that you and your company have the right to sell this property to the United States because you are not prohibited from doing it?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. Under that charter?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly; and we have the right to do it (that is what we claim) without even the assent or interference of the liquidator of the old company; but, to make things quite clear, we have got this agreement with him.

* * * * * * *

Senator TURNER. What principle of law authorized that court to render a decree cutting the stockholders of the old company out of the benefits of your contract with this liquidator for their benefit?

M. LAMPRE. I do not get the question quite well, Senator.

Senator TURNER. You contracted as a part of your charter, I understand you to say, that you would build this canal and operate it and pay the liquidator for the benefit of the old company 60 per cent?

M. LAMPRE. Yes.

Senator TURNER. Now, if you sell out to the United States, of course you can not carry out that obligation to the old company or to the stockholders of the old company.

M. LAMPRE. No. I understand.

Senator TURNER. And there will be nothing to go to them. This contract with the liquidator relieves you of the obligation for the benefit of the stockholders of the old company?

M. LAMPRE. Yes; but we shall have to let them share in the amount we may obtain.

Senator TURNER. Now, I want to know what principle of law of France would authorize the liquidator to make a contract which would cut the old stockholders out from the benefits of the provisions of that contract.

M. LAMPRE. The general principle under which receiverships are organized.

Senator TURNER. Your company is not in the hands of a receiver, is it?

M. LAMPRE. No.

Senator TURNER. It is still operating?

M. LAMPRE. Still operating.

Senator TURNER. It is still obligated to carry out this contract made for the benefit of its stockholders?

M. LAMPRE. Exactly.

Senator TURNER. What right has this liquidator to relieve it of its obligation to the old stockholders?

M. LAMPRE. I would like to make it clear that the stockholders' meeting of corporations in France is the only authority to decide this business. The court has nothing to do, I wish it to be understood, if possible, with what we, the standing corporation, do. That is the business of the stockholders' meeting.

Senator TURNER. The stockholders of this new company have no right to relieve the new company of this obligation to the stockholders of the old company? They can not by a mere vote relieve themselves from the obligation of their contract?

M. LAMPRE. I do not see that. They can, indeed.

Senator TURNER. You predicate their right upon the action of your stockholders, the stockholders of the new company?

M. LAMPRE. Yes.

Senator TURNER. To contract with the liquidator for the benefit of the stockholders of the old company?

M. LAMPRE. Yes.

Senator TURNER. Now, the action of the stockholders of the new company can not relieve that company from that obligation?

M. LAMPRE. I understand the question itself, but you see I stated in the course of this hearing that we are guided solely and only by our charter, and the charter does not forbid in any way that we should make a transfer or sale of our rights to anybody whatever.

Senator TURNER. But I understood you to say that your charter did contain this contract with the liquidator?

M. LAMPRE. It does contain it.

Senator TURNER. Under which you were to construct this canal and operate it?

M. LAMPRE. The liquidator has authority to relieve us from that contract, and he has agreed to what has been just passed upon.

Senator TURNER. What I ask you is what principle of law authorizes this liquidator to relieve you of the obligation for the benefit of the old stockholders without securing anything to them?

M. LAMPRE. That is the business of the court to decide, and the court has decided it.

The CHAIRMAN. I think you had better make that clear, because I do not believe the Congress of the United States will want to join your company in inflicting an act of absolute injustice upon these old stockholders.

Senator TURNER. Does that decree undertake to cut off the stockholders from pursuing your successor, as they would have a right to pursue you, to compel the performance of the contract by which you got title to the canal?

M. LAMPRE. I do not think that I understand the question. You mean about the 60 per cent?

Senator TURNER. No. Does that decree which you say authorizes you to make this sale cut off——

M. LAMPRE. The rights of the liquidator?

Senator TURNER. The rights of the stockholders of the old company to insist that your company shall carry out the obligation which you undertook to carry out toward them? Does it specifically cut them off?

M. LAMPRE. It does not say so.

Senator TURNER. Then it is a question of judgment as to whether they would have a right not to be cut off if they should insist on it?

M. LAMPRE. You see, sir, our obligations were to give the liquidator 60 per cent out of the profits. We have no profits.

Senator TURNER. Your obligations were to construct the canal and give 60 per cent?

M. LAMPRE. Sixty per cent out of the profits when the canal would be completed; but in the present condition of affairs there is no profit to divide. There will be a fixed amount, whatever it may be, to be divided between the old company and ourselves; and that will be divided according to the decision of that arbitration court under the authority of the agreement passed between the liquidator of the old company and ourselves—an agreement passed under the authority of the court.

It will be seen from this testimony what the general character of title is which we are expected to take to the Panama Canal and for which we are invited to pay $40,000,000. The new company, with its admitted obligations to the old company outstanding and unsatisfied, insist that it has full right, within and of itself and without reference to any other power or authority whatever, to make us full, complete, and indefeasible title, free from liens, equities, obligations, or incumbrances of any character. But to save trouble and contention, and not because it admits any right in the liquidator of the old company or in those for whom he is trustee, it has procured an order of the lower court of the Seine authorizing the liquidator to consent to a sale on any terms that he may see fit, and the liquidator has consented to the sale for $40,000,000.

Mr. STEWART. Who were the parties to that proceeding whereby the order was made? Was the old company brought in?

Mr. TURNER. The liquidator of the old company alone petitioned for this order without any of the parties being brought in.

Mr. STEWART. That is not American law.

Mr. TURNER. I will now state what this order was. This order, made by a court of first instance, without either the stockholders or the bondholders before it, without any showing of the necessity or propriety of a sale, without any representation of the value of the property to be sold or the price expected to be realized for it—this order, with all these infirmities and subject to appeal at the hands of any one of half a million interested parties in France, all of whom have the strongest motive to appeal, is the only thing that bolsters up or supplements the extraordinary claim of power and authority over the property made by the New Panama Canal Company.

That company, with the aid of the Republic of Colombia, may indeed turn over to us the manual physical possession of the Panama Canal if we embrace its offer, but it will not and can not make us title to the property, and it never will be able to do so. That will be done, if ever, only when the new company shall have confessed its failure and retired from the field, and some tribunal, having the old company and all of its beneficiaries before it, shall, for good cause shown, have authorized a sale to us for the exclusive benefit of that company and its beneficiaries. That much is certain to the apprehension of any trained legal mind.

Now, suppose we go on in the face of these legal difficulties and pay $40,000,000 for such title as the Compagnie Nouvelle can make, what will be our situation? The courts of France are under no obligation and would have no right to consider us in a light different from that in which they would regard any other purchaser of property impressed with a trust. Within such time as their laws may permit, and agreeably to their procedure, either by appeal or collateral attack, the order of sale, made in such flagrant disregard of the rights of stockholders and bondholders of the old company, will be declared erroneous, if not void, and will be vacated and set aside. This may not occur until we have paid our money and taken over the property.

In that case the parties insisting on restitution of the property must make to us restitution of the money, but only to the extent that they may have received our money. They can not be called upon to restore any part of the money which may have been retained by the new company. That company is not in court nor are its funds in custodi legis, nor is the old company responsible for its bargains. If the old company or its beneficiaries come to us with clean hands we can not refuse to do equity because we may have bought a gold brick from the New Panama Canal Company. The forum to which the beneficiaries of the old company will appeal for restitution of their rights will not be the courts of France. It is doubtful even whether the laws of that country measure their abstract right or whether that measure is not to be found in the laws of Colombia, where the property affected is situated.

But I assume that their relation to the property under the laws of Colombia would not be more favorable than it is under the laws of France, and hence that consideration is not very material now. But however their right may be measured and whatever its character, there are only two countries in which it may be enforced when we shall have gone into possession of the canal. One of these countries is Colombia, where the property is situated; the other is the United States, where the party whose conscience is bound and whose action is to be contested has its being. Our title to land and property in Colombia is strictly within the competency of her courts to determine. Colombia insists on retaining full sovereignty over the canal strip. When the courts of Colombia shall declare that we took the canal subject to the equities of the bondholders and the stockholders of the old company, there are only two courses left open to us. We can defy the sovereign power of Colombia and maintain our possession by force or we can settle with the bondholders and stockholders on the best obtainable terms.

We will say that the canal, when completed, will be worth only $200,000,000. Sixty per cent of the value of a completed canal, which is the beneficial interest of these people, would be worth, on that basis of value, at the minimum figure, $120,000,000. Would we outrage the moral sense of the world by refusing to recognize the authority of the municipal courts of Colombia to determine the status of property within her borders? Clearly not. We would go down into the Treasury, as we have been doing now these many years, and pay such sum as might be necessary to relieve ourselves of this blunder of our wise and profound statesmen.

The principles governing their rights are so clear that the claimants might not resort to the sovereign power of Colombia in the first instance to have them declared and enforced. Trusting to our perception of elementary legal principles and to our sense of justice, they would probably apply to us directly for redress, and we would be glad to have them do so, and would provide them a forum in which all questions between them and us could be adjusted and settled. We would do this to avoid the embarrassment and humiliation of submitting rights almost sovereign in character and involving the accomplishment of cherished policies of government to the municipal courts of another country. But whether the tribunal adjudicating the rights of the beneficiaries of the old canal company be a court or a commission of the United States or a court of the Republic of Colombia, the character of the rights of the beneficiaries will be the same, and it will require the same measure of compensation in either case to quiet, satisfy, and dispose of them.

I beg the careful attention of the Senate to these propositions. I respectfully insist that they are not the figment of a lively imagination, but that they rest on the logical application to undisputed facts of well-grounded legal principles, to be worked out in the future by an evolution almost as certain as any in nature, because founded on a law of nature, namely, that all men follow where self-interest leads. The only factor in the chain of reasoning which has the least element of uncertainty is that which relates to the action of the bondholders and stockholders of the old company; but since they are men, and men follow their own interests when they know what they are, and these men well know what their interests are, the element of uncertainty as to that factor is reduced to a minimum.

We can of course obtain possession of the Panama Canal through the medium of a sale by the New Panama Canal Company, but there are superior equities which involve the entire beneficial interest in the canal which we have knowledge of, which a sale to us will not cut off, and which will certainly rise up to confound and confuse and embarrass us in the carrying forward of this work in which we are so much interested. That we should take such a burden on our shoulders when we can accomplish the results sought for less money, even if title were clear, and with equal, if not greater, benefits, by proceeding on absolutely safe lines in another direction, is a proposition so unreasonable that I do not believe the Senate will embrace it or seriously consider it.

Mr. President, I have discussed only one phase of the legal difficulties involved in the acceptance of the offer of the New Panama Canal Company to sell to us the uncompleted Panama Canal. There are many others of great importance which ought to be presented in extenso, but which I shall not undertake so to present because of the time already consumed by me in the tedious and necessary discussion of that phase which has seemed most important. Ourr elations as a stockholder in the Panama Railroad Company, a New York corporation, need consideration. I have heard the question asked, "Can the United States become a stockholder in a corporation of one of its States?" I think that question may be answered in the affirmative. But can the United States become a majority stockholder with a view of destroying the commercial value of the property of a State corporation? That is a more difficult question. I do not think she can. If she becomes such stockholder in fact, can she use the power thereby acquired to destroy the value of the assets of the corporation to the injury of her associates in the company?

Can she lawfully build up a rival instrumentality to that belonging to the corporation of which she is a member, use the latter in its building, and by her ascendant vote stifle the protests of her associates? These are questions that may not have been of moment in France, but they are of moment to us and must receive answer whenever we step into the shoes of the French company. New York will have something to say in reply to these questions. Her courts undoubtedly will speak, and they will speak the language of truth and justice, and since they may lawfully control the conduct of their own domestic corporations, the United States must accept and obey the injunctions which they will lay down. It will not be necessary to sue the United States. She will not appear in the transaction save as a stockholder. The president and secretary and board of trustees will be individuals subject to the municipal jurisdiction of the State, and the coercive power of the State will be applied through them.

The minority, moreover, may appeal to the courts of Colombia, where the property is situated and where the United States may be made a party to the litigation without question or objection. The first question litigated in the courts of one or both of these jurisdictions, and probably in both at the same time, will be, Can the United States, consistently with her obligations to her associate stockholders in the railroad company, engage in an enterprise which will destroy the value of the common property? Next, Can she use her majority vote in the control of the railroad company for the purpose of devoting the railroad to the building and equipping the rival enterprise? When she shall have secured an affirmative answer to these two questions, if she shall ever do so, the next question will be, Upon what terms may she, consistently with her obligations to the associate stockholders, employ the railroad in building, equipping, and operating the canal? Certainly it can not be contended that one stockholder in a railroad company, even though he be a majority stockholder, may, at his own will and pleasure, fix rail rates upon services rendered for him by the railroad. He can not, at his own will and pleasure, and because he wishes to favor a rival enterprise in which he is interested, cause the company to be disincorporated and to go out of business.

The most favorable view that anyone can take of the transaction involves our conducting the railroad until 1966 as a commercial enterprise, paying during the period of construction enormous freights and rentals in order that the individual stockholders may receive their pro rata of the earnings in dividends, and after the period of construction, during the remainder of the life of the railroad concession, paying the like dividends to the individual stockholders as compensation for having destroyed the earning power of their property. This might all be avoided, of course, by buying out the individual stockholders, and I presume they would all be willing to sell; but if they are wise, and I presume they are, twenty times the par value of their stock would not be more than sufficient to induce them to forego the rich prospect which our mistake had presented to them.

Another question akin to these, although presenting a more diplomatic than a legal question, is: "Can we safely deal for the purchase of all the property of the French canal corporation without the consent of France?" The charter was granted under her law; the objects of the company were national as well as international, and she has reserved to herself in the laws aiding the company peculiar and exceptional advantages. In the law of June 8, 1888, France required that all raw material employed in the accomplishment of the work should be of French origin, and that all machinery employed should be made in France. That law stands to this day. Can we, without a breach of comity, deal with the corporation in such a way as to defeat the governmental objects had in view when France chartered the company, among which, but not the most important of which, is the right reserved to supply the machinery and raw materials? It is settled law in this country that a corporation by a sale of all its property may not become a felo de se, and thereby defeat the public object which formed the consideration for its creation.

If the law be the same in France, may not the French Government interpose to prevent the sale of the canal property to us? Or if the law as to corporations be not the same there as with us, is not the principle sufficiently broad and universal, especially in view of the reservations made by France in her own favor, to give her just cause of complaint if, without consulting her, we deal with this creature of hers to her detriment? It certainly seems to me that these questions must be answered in the affirmative. These considerations are not weakened by the fact, upon which some stress has been laid, that in 1880 the French Government, when questioned by our Government concerning its interest in the proposed Panama Canal, declared that France "in no way proposed to interfere therein or to give it any support, either direct or indirect." The interference of France or the giving the enterprise support was not necessary to the retention of its interest in the enterprise as a creation of the French law or to its right to insist that this thing to which it had given life for its own purpose might not be stricken down by some other nation. It is to be remembered, moreover, that this declaration of France was eight years before the law of 1888, whereby that country did, in fact, interfere and give the enterprise support, and whereby it reserved to itself the compensating advantages to which I have referred.

Another fact to be remembered is that the declaration had reference to the operation of the Old Panama Canal Company; and it may very justly be said that the failure of that company, involving so disastrously the interests of the French people, put an entirely different aspect on the proposition. And this may be said with the greater force when we remember that the new company was formed to rescue and rehabilitate these imperiled interests and to give them substantial value, and that France, by numerous acts of legislation in aid of the new company, has shown her great sympathy and interest in that purpose, and when we remember, further, that if we now buy the canal for $40,000,000, provided we can lawfully do so, every dollar, substantially, put by the French people in the Panama Canal is gone from them forever and without the shadow of a hope of recovery.

Who knows anything about the views of the French Government on this question of sale? Who has ever asked France to express her views on the subject? No one. Mr. Lampre tells us that it is French law that a private company in France may sell its property and go out of business without consulting the French Government, and upon this statement, which may be correct in ordinary transactions, but which takes no note of international law and the reciprocal rights and obligations of nations toward each other, we are gravely invited to make a headlong dash, blindfolded, into a sea of difficulties and complications with a country toward which we are under the most sacred obligations of comity and friendship. France may not object, but she has not said so, and I respectfully insist, so long as she maintains any reserve whatever, that we have no right to deal with one of her creatures in a matter which so vitally concerns her just interests.

Mr. President, it would be a waste of words to enlarge on the value to this country and to the world of a ship canal at the Isthmus. That is well known and acknowledged by all. If the hope of the country in that regard is defeated, it will not be by reason of any doubt on that point by any Senator. But I will say a word before concluding concerning the point of view from which it is regarded on the Pacific coast. The completion of the canal will at once give that coast relief from the onerous burdens imposed on it by the transcontinental railways, and those burdens have been and still are very great. In saying this I would not be thought unmindful of the benefits which the transcontinental railways have conferred on the Pacific coast. Without them the greater part of that section would still be a barren wilderness.

But the fact that they have been instrumental in building up an empire does not give them the right to blight its expansion, to control its every motion, and to say that it shall have no relief from conditions which were well enough in the formative period, but which have long since become intolerable. With advance beyond the primitive needs of a pioneer people comes the demand for all the aids in industrial progress, including cheap and adequate transportation facilities, necessary to put that people on an equal plane with their brothers everywhere throughout the length and breadth of the land. The transcontinental railroads either can not or will not yield to that demand. The truth is, probably, that in some instances they can not and in others they will not. It is probably impracticable to expect them to transport the wheat and lumber, the two principal export products of the Pacific coast, across the continent for a compensation which will leave the producer anything over and above the cost of production.

But they can haul a bushel of wheat across the State of Washington for as small a charge as they make for hauling a keg of nails from Pittsburg to the Pacific coast. It is possible for them to fix a west-bound rate on those things which the Pacific coast must purchase in the East which will bear some relation to the value of the service rendered as compared with charges for similar services rendered in other sections of the country. It is possible to give the cramped and stifled industries of the Pacific coast a distributing rate from the point of production under which they can live, instead of discriminating against them grossly, as they now do, for the purpose of compelling the people to procure the product of such industries at the expense of a long transcontinental haul.

It is possible for them to find a good profit for easy service in the growing local traffic of that great country if they would but conserve and promote it instead of reaping an inadequate profit in the performance of a most arduous service, such as is involved in a transcontinental haul of everything that the people of the coast are compelled to buy or which they produce for the purpose of sale. To compel this long haul, to crush out every effort to escape from its necessity, is the present policy, as it has always been the past policy, of the transcontinental railroads. It is impossible for a fair-minded man of average intelligence to make even a cursory examination of the commodity and class rates of the transcontinental railroads without finding undoubtable proof of the truth of my assertion.

It is not my purpose, however, to discuss in this connection the transcontinental railway problem. I may do so at a later period and in another connection. I have referred to the matter here for the purpose of indicating to Senators the fact that the Pacific coast has a special interest in this great enterprise, while at the same time it has an equal interest with the balance of the country in it, considered with reference to its importance in the national defense and in stimulating the general commercial activity of the nation. Its beneficial effects on the Pacific coast will be immediate and profound. It will immediately add 10 per cent in value to our productions. It will diminish by 10 per cent the cost of living for our people. It will add 20 per cent to their annual accumulations. It would do this even if the enterprise should not add a ship to our national merchant marine or bring a single additional customer to our merchant princes. This is our special interest; but it is one, I venture to say, which will be overborne and lost sight of very soon after the canal is completed in the benefits conferred on the other sections of our country.

In the ultimate benefits to be garnered from the enterprise the Atlantic coast will far outstrip the Pacific. To the Atlantic coast the canal means access to new fields of commercial activity and added and improved facilities for controlling those fields already within the range of its energies. It not only brings the west coast of Central and South America to the doors of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New Orleans, but it puts those cities on an even and in some respects a superior footing with their Old World rivals for the control of the trade of the Orient. They become at once the most important factors in the development of the trade with China and Japan; and that development, if the isthmian canal be made, will line the Pacific Ocean with larger and more magnificent fleets than any which now plow the turbulent waters of the North Atlantic.

The enterprise means all this to the Atlantic coast. But it means no new fields of activity to the people of the Pacific coast. It even destroys to some extent the well-founded hope in which they have indulged, that their advantageous situation would ultimately give them the control of the trade of the Orient. But it gives them a present outlet for the products of the field, the forest, and the mine which find their greatest demand in the markets of Europe and the value of which at present is minimized by harsh and forbidding conditions. It insures to them in addition the opportunity of developing and exploiting their resources for their own benefit and of building up within and for themselves a trade and commerce which shall make them a self-supporting instead of a dependent people.

For this prospect of reaping the fruits of the present, they are willing to give up much which present conditions hold out to them the hope of realizing in the future. Moreover, they are young and strong and active and patriotic. They are for that which the interest of the nation requires, recognizing that they will grow with its growth and languish with its decay. And recognizing that nothing will promote our national growth or protect our national integrity more than an isthmian canal, they have laid their mandate on their representatives in Congress and demand of them that they shall do that in aid of the enterprise which is practicable and feasible and will produce results. And hence I am for the House bill which is now on our table. I am for it because I am in earnest in desiring a canal, and because I feel that we shall have no canal for long years to come if we do not enact that bill into a law.

Others who are equally as earnest in favor of a canal may not agree with me, and in case their views shall prevail and the House bill be defeated, time only can determine between us. But why involve the project in doubt? Why raise any question whatever? Why take any chances? The project provided for in the House bill is safe and sure, is economical, and is fruitful of the commercial and military results which we are all anxious to gather. We can make no mistake if we adopt that bill. I respectfully insist that those who really and truly want a canal at the Isthmus, and who want it now, can only give adequate and forceful expression to their wishes by supporting that wise, sensible, prudent, and well-considered measure.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I wish to cite an authority on the subject of the liability of the New Panama Canal Company for the obligations of the old company, which liabilities we would incur if we buy this property, as I conceive and as I firmly believe. It is from our former colleague in the Senate, Mr. Pasco, who is a member of the Isthmian Canal Commission. On May 11, 1900, all of the Commission appeared before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and were examined in regard to the progress they had made and their opinions upon different questions, including the law question which has just been discussed. That law question was suggested by a paper which was presented to the Government, to Mr. Hay, and also to the chairman of the committee in the House of Representatives by the New Panama Canal Company for the purpose of recommending the Panama route to the people of the United States. The entire document is in print and in the archives of the Senate. Mr. Pasco was under examination. Colonel Ernst was——

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator would kindly give the pages of the record from which he reads it will aid those who wish to follow him.

Mr. MORGAN. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. You do not know whether that $13,000,000 was derived from the property they bought at the sale or whether they went into their pockets for it?

Mr. PASCO. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. On page 31 of this document, if you will turn to it, subdivision 14, they account for the relations with the old stockholders.

Colonel ERNST. Mr. Chairman, if you care to hear it, I was told that they had not sold any property down there. Those old dredges did not belong to the company. They belonged to some contractors, and were sold to the Maritime Canal Company. They told us they had not sold any property at all.

The CHAIRMAN. They probably collected unpaid balances of stock in France.

Colonel ERNST. I understand there were some unpaid balances that that receiver did get hold of.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; that is where the money came from, a large part of it. Now, I will read subdivision 14, on page 31:

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Of what document, please?

Mr. MORGAN. The document that was submitted by the Panama Canal Company to Mr. Hay and also submitted at a different time, within a day or two of it, to the chairman of the committee; I do not know whether it was a select committee or whether it was the Committee on Commerce of the House. I will bring the original report:

XIV. The security holders of the old company have no vote, voice, title, or ownership in the property of the new company or in the administration of its affairs. By private contract merely the new company has agreed that after all expenses of operation, maintenance, exploitation, dividends, reserve funds, etc., are provided for, a specified share of the surplus income shall be paid to the liquidator of the old company for the benefit of his constituents; but this agreement has no effect upon or relation to the absolute ownership and administration of the canal by the new company.

That was the proposition submitted by the Panama Canal Company to this Government.

That is to say—

This is what I said about it—

That is to say, they have got the legal title and hold it in trust.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. Chairman, although that is stated to be a private contract, it was a part of the terms upon which the new company was organized; and they were bound under that contract to pay this amount out, so that the old company still has this interest in the control of assets and profits of the new company.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all I wanted to ask you, Mr. Pasco.

Mr. Pasco goes on:

So that this interest still exists in the old company to that extent, whether it may be worth little or much.

The CHAIRMAN. And it was upon that predicate that this court went on and appointed a manager here, when the former board resigned.

Mr. PASCO. At a subsequent date?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; on January 6, 1900

Mr. PASCO. They took the bargain with that burden, and of course it is still upon them.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Navarre says:

"The board of management has resigned and I have been appointed by a decision of the court sole temporary manager of the New Panama Canal Company, instead of the board of management, and with its powers."

So that that court sits there with the cause still in fieri for the purpose of controlling matters, even to the appointment of the manager of the canal, for the benefit of these old stockholders. The property has been sold, and there is no property there. There is nothing but the old stockholders with their claims; and upon that predicate the court went on and appointed a manager.

Mr. PASCO. The old stockholders have still got that interest, through their liquidator or receiver, in the assets of the new company.

I merely wanted to quote that to show that there were some changes of opinion among these commissioners upon various questions, but none whatever upon the engineering. So they assert. The change that took place, as has been argued here time and again, and I think it is impossible to deny it, was effected in consequence of the fact that this was supposed to be a better bargain than the estimate which was made by the Commission for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal. But on this question of law Mr. Pasco then stated his view. After the preliminary report of the Isthmian Canal Commission was made—this same Commission—in which they affirmed all of their previous findings, and the attorney, I will call him of the Government, who was the attorney or the lawyer of the Commission, had decided that these incumbrances rested upon this property, they had then before them everything that had been done in the way of judicial proceedings by the court of France.

I do not state this, Mr. President, for the purpose of making any accusation against Mr. Pasco either as to his judgment or otherwise, but it seems to me that when an attorney makes up an opinion upon a record and states it thus to a commission and afterwards the commission in their preliminary report act upon it, it is rather late to withdraw it or to change it after that. If that fact stands in this record, if that is true, then we can not buy the property from this new company without buying the incumbrance which rests upon it, for it is a trust estate in the hands of the new company. burdened with all of the equities that belonged to the estate at the time they took it, and no court can discharge them from that except in the case the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER] mentioned, where the trustee company becomes insolvent and that is the best which can be done with their assets.

That was not the fact here. This new company in a letter to the President, which I will read before this discussion closes—I have brought it into the RECORD here time and again—boasts of its solvency and ability to command money, and says that it is perfectly able to go on and complete the contract. Mr. President, a more fallacious and deceptious and outrageous statement was never made for the purpose of deceiving man or government than that.

I have not made in this case, and I do not expect to make, any other than a few discursive remarks, with the exception of the first argument or statement I made some weeks ago in respect of the evidence, and on the other day a statement of the character of the people and of the country with whom we were dealing and what we might expect from a people of that character in such a country as that, a country of revolution, that has not been quiet one moment in the last forty or fifty years—a country which is always in conflict, with mobs continually defying the law, doing as they please with government and private property and private persons, including citizens of the United States who have unfortunately been there at the time of their outbreak.

In order to get evidence on that point which I think is superior to any statements which have yet been made here, on yesterday I asked the Senate to print extracts from Five Years in Panama, a book written by Dr. Wolfred Nelson, corresponding member of the Natural History Society of Montreal, Canada, who went to Panama in 1881 and resided there until 1886, practicing his profession in company with his brother, who was also a doctor, and who was either at Panama or Colon, he does not say which in his book. The other gentleman is dead.

After Dr. Nelson got home, long before this controversy arose, he was making statements to his friends as to the condition of affairs down there, and his statements were so interesting and so valuable that they insisted he should publish them. In order to do so he again visited the Isthmus of Panama twice and took photographic pictures of the different objects which he mentioned in his book. Of course they are not in this print.

Now, Mr. President, without reading it, I desire to incorporate this as a part of my remarks, but I wish to read a certain portion of it for the purpose of bringing in another paper that I also wish to have brought to the attention of the Senate. Dr. Nelson says:

I have been told by a gentleman who is competent to give an opinion, and in whose word I have implicit confidence, that the code of civil procedure of the United States of Colombia is excellent. It is claimed that it is quite the equal of the historic "Code Napoleon," than which there is not better law. The law on the statute books and its application in Panama are opposite conditions. I can best make this point plain by citing a case.

I do not care to read that case or any other case he cites, although he cites several of them, but I wish to come to another part of the law which obtains in that Isthmus, now under what we might call a constitutional agreement. Before bringing it to the attention of the Senate I will read one or two sections from it. It is printed here both in English and in Spanish. He put it in both languages in order that his translation of it could not possibly be shown to be incorrect:

ART. 34. A marriage contracted in conformity with the rites of the Catholic religion annuls ipso jure a purely civil marriage previously entered into with another person.

ART. 35. For purely civil effects the law recognizes the legitimacy of the children conceived previously to the annulment of the civil marriage in accordance with the provisions of the last preceding article.

ART. 36. The man who, after having contracted a civil marriage, afterwards marries another woman according to the rites of the Catholic Church, is required to provide subsistence to the woman and his children by her until she marries canonically.

In Papers Relating to the Foreign Relations of the United States, published by authority of the Government, part 1 of the publication of 1888, on pages 416, 417, 418, and 419, there is a concordat, and I will read the agreement by which that was made the law of that country and is still the law:

NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL,
Bogota, February 24, 1888.

Considering (1) that in the celebration of the foregoing convention the Government has acted within the powers conferred upon it by article 56 of the fundamental law of the Republic;

(2) That by this agreement, which satisfactorily and consistently settles all pending questions between the church and the state in conformity with the new national régime, and at the same time responds to imperious necessity and public well-being, which demanded the definition of the mutual relations between the civil and the ecclesiastical powers; and

(3) That its stipulations conform strictly to the provisions of articles 38, 41, 47, 53, 54, and 55 of the constitution,

It is decreed:

Article 1. That the foregoing convention is hereby approved and incorporated in the present law.

Article 2. The amount to be paid out of the treasury of the Republic to fulfill its obligations thereby created is hereby appropriated and will be included in the budget for the present fiscal period.

Given at Bogota this 24th day of February, 1888.

JOSE MARIA RUBIO, F.,
Vice-President.

EXECUTIVE GOVERNMENT,
Bogota, February 27, 1888.

Let it be published and executed.

[L. S.] RAFAEL NUNEZ.

Countersigned.

VICENTE RESTREPO,
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

If I were to do the subject and myself justice I would read this concordat. There never was a more perfect strangulation of all civil power by an ecclesiastical concordat than this. I do not refer to it because I have the slightest objection to any man in the world being a Catholic or a member of the Catholic Church. I think it is a very excellent church. But when the ecclesiastical powers at Rome, by a concordat agreed to by the government of any state, have the authority to exercise such powers as are contained in this concordat over the people, there is no possible chance, while that remains the law of that land, for any man who migrates from the United States, whatever his color or condition may be, to have the privileges or to exercise the rights of an American freeman. It is impossible.

With the permission of the Senate I will incorporate this paper in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

The paper referred to is as follows:

Mr. Walker to Mr. Bayard.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, March 7, 1888. (Received April 6.)

SIR: As a subject which may be of interest to the State Department and important to some of our citizens coming to this country to reside, I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy in Spanish of the "concordat," recently celebrated between the Holy See of Rome and the Colombian Government, with a careful translation. In making this translation I regretted that I did not have access to the original Latin text in which it was drawn up and signed, but had to content myself with the Spanish translation, which in some of the articles is vague and ambiguous. The first clause of the seventeenth article is so much so that in my translation I was forced to be paraphrastic rather than literal.

As a part of the same subject I herewith transmit a copy with translation of law 30, passed by the legislative council on the 25th of February last, which virtually annuls all civil marriages celebrated at any time in the past, unless the ceremony was also performed canonically. The annulment of the marriage, however, does not illegitimatize the children of such marriage.

I am, sir, etc.,

JOHN G. WALKER.

CONCORDAT ENTERED INTO BETWEEN POPE LEO XIII AND THE REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA.

[Concluded December 31, 1887. Ratified by the legislative council of Colombia February 24, 1888.]

In the name of the most holy and indivisible Trinity, the Supreme Pontiff, Leo XIII, and the most excellent Rafael Nunez, President of the Republic of Colombia, by their respective representatives, to wit, on the part of his holiness the most eminent Monsignore Mariana Rampolla del Tindero, cardinal presbyter of the most holy church St. Cecelia and papal secretary of state and on the part of the Republic His Excellency Joaquin Velez, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary near the Holy See, who, after a mutual exchange of credentials, have concluded the following convention:

ARTICLE 1. The Catholic, Roman, apostolic, is the religion of Colombia, the public authorities of which shall recognize it as an essential element of social order, and they bind themselves to protect it in all its rights and privileges and to cause it and its ministers to be respected.

ART. 2. The Catholic Church shall be free and independent of the civil authorities and shall freely exercise all its spiritual authority and jurisdiction, conforming in its administrative government solely to its own laws.

ART. 3. Canonical legislation shall be free of the civil, and shall form no part of the latter, but will be respected by the latter.

ART. 4. A church represented by the hierarchical authorities is recognized by the State as a true and legitimate entity, with capacity to exercise and enjoy all rights pertaining to such.

ART. 5. The church has the right of acquiring, possessing, and administering real and personal property in accordance to general laws, and its lands and establishments shall be no less inviolable than those of the citizens of the Republic.

ART. 6. Ecclesiastical property may be taxed in the same manner and to the same extent as the property of private individuals, except edifices for public worship, theological seminaries, and the residences of the clergy, which are exempted from all taxation, occupation, or appropriation to other uses.

ART. 7. The secular and regular clergy shall not be required to perform public duties incompatible with their ministry and profession, and at all times shall be exempt from military service.

ART. 8. The Government shall enact such laws as will protect the sacerdotal dignity whenever, for any cause, a minister of the church may figure in criminal trials.

ART. 9. Diocesan bishops and parish priests may claim from the faithful the emoluments and ecclesiastical fees canonically and equitably established, either by the immemorial custom of the diocese or by the rules of religious service; and in order that such acts and obligations may produce civil effects and that the temporal authority may lend its support the bishops shall proceed in accord with the Government.

ART. 10. Competent ecclesiastical authority has the right in Colombia to establish religious orders of both sexes, to be governed by suitable constitutions; but in order to secure the enjoyment of the rights of a lawful corporation and the protection of the laws, they must present to the civil authorities the canonical authorization issued by their ecclesiastical superior.

ART. 11. The Holy See will lend its support and cooperation to the government for the establishment in Colombia of religious institutions, giving preference to those for charitable purposes, for missions, for the education of youth, and for general education, and to other works of public utility and beneficence.

ART. 12. Public education and instruction in universities, colleges, schools, and in other centers of instruction shall be organized and directed in conformity with the dogmas and moral teachings of the Catholic Church.

ART. 13. Consequently, in such centers of instruction the respective diocesan bishops, either by themselves or by special delegation, shall exercise the right in whatever concerns religion and morals, and inspect and revise the text-books in use in the same.

The Archbishop of Bogota shall prescribe the text-books relating to religion and morals to be used in the universities; and to insure uniformity of teaching on those subjects, said prelate, in connection with other bishops, shall choose the text-books for the other schools of official instruction.

The Government shall see that no lectures are delivered on literary, scientific, or general subjects in any branch of learning that inculcates ideas contrary to Catholic dogmas or calculated to lessen the respect due to the church.

ART. 14. If, in spite of the orders and precautions of the Government, the moral and religious teaching (in universities, colleges, etc.) shall not conform to Catholic doctrines the respective diocesans may withdraw from the offending professors and masters the privilege of teaching any such branches.

ART. 15. The Holy See has the right to fill vacancies in archbishopries and bishoprics, but the Holy Father, as an evidence of special deference, and to the end of preserving perfect harmony between the church and the State, agrees that in filling such vacancies the previous consent of the President shall be obtained. To that end when such vacancies occur the President may recommend directly to the Holy See such ecclesiastics as in his judgment unite in themselves the gifts and qualifications necessary for the episcopal dignity; and the Holy See on its part, before making the appointment, shall always communicate the names of the candidates for promotion, in order to ascertain whether or not the President considers the candidates civilly or politically disqualified for such positions. Vacancies in the bishoprics shall be filled as soon as possible, and in no case to remain unfilled for more than six months.

ART. 16. The Holy See may erect new dioceses or change the limits of those existing whenever it is thought opportune and useful for the better care of souls, previously consulting the Government and admitting such suggestions as may be reasonable and just.

ART. 17. All persons professing the Catholic religion desirous of contracting marriage should have the ceremony performed according to the rites of the church.

The civil effects of marriage in respect to the persons and property of the contracting parties and their descendants can only be secured when the marriage is performed in accordance with the prescriptions of council of Trent. This celebration shall be witnessed by the functionary who may be designated by law for the sole purpose of verifying the entry of the marriage in the civil registry. But in case of marriage in articulo mortis, when this formality might be difficult of observance, it may be dispensed with and other proof substituted.

It being the business of the contracting parties to secure the intervention of the civil functionary for the registry, the duty of the clergyman is limited to an admonition as to the requirements of the civil law.

ART. 18. In order to give marriages celebrated at whatever period, according to the prescriptions of the council of Trent, civil effect, suppletary evidence of ecclesiastical origin will be given preference.

ART. 19. Matrimonial causes affecting the marriage relation, cohabitation, and the validity of espousals pertain exclusively to the ecclesiastical authority, the civil consequences of marriage to the temporal.

ART. 20. The armies of the Republic shall enjoy the indulgences known as castrenses, to be regulated by the Holy Father in a separate act.

ART. 21. Following the divine offices there shall be offered up in all the churches of the Republic the following prayers: Domine salvam fac rempublicam; domine salvum fac praesidem ejus et supermas ejus auctoritates.

ART. 22. The Government of the Republic recognizes in perpetuity as a consolidated debt the value of the redeemed annuities (censos) now in the treasury and of the estates belonging to the church fraternities, charitable foundations, chapels, establishments for instruction and benevolence erected by the church, which at any time may have been inscribed in the public debt of the nation. This recognized debt is to bear interest without diminution at the annual rate of 4½ per cent, payable every six months.

ART. 23. The income arising from sequestrated benefices and tithings pertaining to charitable institutions, chapels, monasteries, and other separate foundations is recognized and shall be paid to those who have the right to receive them or to their legal representatives. This payment shall be made without diminution, as is provided for in the last preceding article, to commence with the year 1888. In case any such bodies have become extinct the amounts due them by a previous arrangement with the Government shall be applied to pious and charitable objects without in any case contravening the intention of the founders.

ART. 24. In view of the present condition of the national treasury of Colombia and the benefit derived by the church from the observance of this convention the Holy See makes the following relinquishments:

(a) The value of the principal of the sequestered property belonging to the aforesaid extinct convents and religious bodies of both sexes, not included in the foregoing articles, and which has not in any manner been recognized. (b) Whatever is due to such extinct organizations for rents or interest already accrued or in whatever manner resulting from said sequestration previous to the 31st of December, 1887.

ART. 25. In consideration of the foregoing favor the Government of Colombia agrees to secure, in perpetuity, an annual net sum, hereby fixed at 100,000 Colombian dollars, to be increased when the said treasury is in a better condition, said payments to be applied to the uses of the dioceses, chapters, seminaries, missions, and such other civilizing works of the church, and in such manner as may be agreed upon between the high contracting parties.

ART. 26. The surviving members of the extinct religious communities shall continue in the enjoyment, for their maintenance and other necessities, of such revenues as may have belonged to them by virtue of previous laws and decrees.

ART. 27. In like manner shall be paid the rents and incomes set aside by anterior laws and decrees for the support of public worship in churches, chapels, and other religious places not included in article 22. If concerning this point there should be doubt or difficulty, the Government shall communicate with the competent ecclesiastical authorities, to the end that a good understanding may be arrived at.

ART. 28. The Government shall return to religious bodies such of their sequestrated property as has no distinct destination; but if the owner does not come forward, or if he fills no ecclesiastical office, it may be sold and the proceeds applied to pious and benevolent objects, according to the most pressing needs of each diocese, the proceeding in such cases to be in accord with the ecclesiastical authorities.

ART. 29. The Holy See, in order to secure public tranquillity, declares for its part that persons who purchased ecclesiastical property during the past changes in Colombia or who have redeemed annuities (censos) in the national treasury according to the provisions of the civil law at the time in force shall not be disturbed in any manner by the ecclesiastical authorities, a favor extended not only to those who performed the acts, but to those who, in the exercise of whatsoever functions, may have taken part in the same in such manner that the first purchasers as well as their legal successors and those who have redeemed annuities (censos) shall enjoy in peace and security said property, its products and emoluments, stipulating, however, that the Republic shall not in future repeat similar acts of seizure.

ART. 30. The Government of the Republic shall arrange with the respective diocesan bishops all that relates to cemeteries, reconciling the exigencies of their civil and sanitary character with the veneration due the sacredness of such places and with ecclesiastical prescriptions. In case of misunderstandings on such subjects they will be arranged between the Holy See and the Government.

ART. 31. Agreements between the Holy See and the Government of Colombia for fostering Catholic missions among barbarous tribes shall not require the after approval of Congress.

ART. 32. The present convention repeals and renders null and void all laws, orders, and decrees in whatsoever mode or period they were promulgated in such parts as may contradict or are inconsistent with this convention, which shall remain the permanent law of the State.

ART. 33. The ratification of this convention shall take place within six months from the date of its signature or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof the said plenipotentiaries sign and seal this convention.

Done at Rome the 31st day of December, 1887.

M. CARDINAL RAMPOLLA.
JOAQUIN F. VELEZ.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask leave also to incorporate the other paper, extracts from Five Years at Panama, by Dr. Nelson.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to that request.

The matter referred to is as follows:

EXTRACTS FROM "FIVE YEARS AT PANAMA," BY WOLFRED NELSON, CORRESPONDING MEMBER NATURAL HISTORY SOCIETY, MONTREAL, CANADA.

My residence of five years at Panama, 1880 to 1885, as a practitioner of medicine, together with my knowledge of Spanish and French, gave me ample facilities for studying the natural and unnatural in my surroundings. Since I gave up my residence on the Isthmus, I have made it four visits, the last two in March and April of this year, when I made the negatives furnishing the illustrations for this book.

Colon "as is" is not Colon "as was." The Colon of May 29, 1880, when I landed there, was totally destroyed by fire on the 31st of March, 1885, during a revolution on the Isthmus, involving a loss of $12,000,000. It was the only settlement on the island, which on some charts is called Manzanillo. It is of a coralline formation, built by those indefatigable toilers of the sea. It is three-quarters of a mile long by about one-third of a mile wide, with a surface slightly above the sea level, perhaps as much as 3 feet, and is connected with the Spanish main by a railway embankment.

Beyond the church is the Panama Railway hospital, facing a dense growth of the water-loving mangrove. Its rear looks out on the sea.

The land side of the island was occupied by the working classes, a thoroughly cosmopolitan lot. They were of all kinds—black, white, yellow, native, and foreign.

Before dismissing Colon let me revert to its climate once more, as climate means health or sickness. Upon getting to Panama the dean of the medical faculty, a Colombian, neatly divided the seasons as follows. He said to me: "First you have the wet season, lasting from about the 15th of April to the 15th of December, when people die of yellow fever in four or five days. Next you have the dry or healthy season, from December 15 to April 15, when people die of pernicious fever in from twenty-four to thirty-six hours."

Five years as a practitioner of medicine at Panama amply confirmed his views, and it is the best division of the seasons that I know of. And apropos of climate, sickness, and dying, a few words about Mount Hope or Monkey Hill, as the latter has become the final resting place of thousands. It is the cemetery on the Colon side of the Isthmus. Mount Hope is its baptismal name, and "Monkey Hill" is its everyday appellation. It is reached by rail. Funeral trains are as much an institution as passenger or goods trains. Since the advent of De Lessep's canal men, on the 28th day of February, 1881, thousands upon thousands have been buried there. During two seasons of epidemic it is said that the burials averaged from 30 to 40 per day, and that for weeks together.

I reached Panama on the 29th day of May, 1880. It then had a population estimated at 15,000, the majority being black—negroes, Indians, mulattoes, and a blending of both races, with some Chinese. Perhaps there were as many as 2,000 whites on the Isthmus. The principal trade of the Isthmus was then, as it is now, in the hands of foreigners, with foreign enterprise and foreign capital.

The yellow fever on the Isthmus of Panama is a peculiar malignant disease. I can recall 41 admissions to the Charity Hospital in a few weeks following my arrival on the Isthmus in 1880. Not a single man escaped. Of seven and twenty admissions to the officers' ward of the canal hospitals on the Panama side one man only escaped. In case after case in practice death was the rule and recovery the exception. While it is true that some total abstainers on the Isthmus have been swept away by yellow fever, I can recall three desperate cases, one being my own, which had been abandoned and in which death was looked for. All recovered, thanks to abstemious habits.

Well do I recall a scene during my visit to the Isthmus in February, 1886, when I saw Count De Lesseps inspecting the canal plant under the spiritual guidance of a German bishop, M. Thiele, of Costa Rica. A lane leading from the main thoroughfare to the seashore back of the Protestant cemetery had both of its sides lined with piles and piles of rubbish and old bedding or that on which people had died. The natives in Panama and in the Spanish West Indies, after death, throw away cots, mattresses, pillows, and often the eating utensils of the "late departed."

As many on the Isthmus, both native and foreign, die of yellow fever and smallpox, this practice means simply a constant perpetuation of the infectious and contagious diseases named. The authorities never do more than publish an item on reform in La Cronista or La Estrella de Panama. This is deemed ample, as it gives the people something to think about, and yet these authorities fondly fancy that they are the sanitarians of the century. I remember an old well near the gas works, one of those huge stone wells which the Spaniards were so fond of building. That well had been filled in with just such bedding, and at last it coned up above it. That is their way, and a very bad one it is, too.

HABITS OF THE NATIVES.

The Indians and the negroes in Colombia are not greatly given to marriage. They simply get mated. I use the word advisedly. The women of the poor or laboring class do not care for matrimony, their stated objection being that if they were true and lawful wives their husbands would illtreat them, whereas as long as they are mated the man will be on his good conduct. To one who knows something of the history of the Indian tribes and their African allies in that part of the world, there is much sound reasoning in their view. These women know the men of their class thoroughly, and they deem matrimony little better than serfdom.

The Isthmus, like other tropical countries, abounds in snakes. During the time that my brother, the late Dr. George W. Nelson, was resident surgeon of the canal hospitals on the Panama side one of the orderlies, a Jamaica negro, thought he would have a snake hunt within the hospital grounds. He was successful in finding the snake, but, despite his dexterity, he was bitten between the toes and died the next day.

The Gulf of Panama is noted for its islands. The early history is full of stories regarding them and the many gallant and daring exploits that have taken place on the shores and waters. The gulf is about 100 miles long, and opposite the city of Panama perhaps 20 miles across. The modern city of Panama is situated at its upper end. The gulf is remarkable for its currents and tides, the latter rising and falling from 16 to 24 feet, according to the age of the moon. The Gulf of Panama and the ocean for a great distance to the westward from its mouth are notorious for their freedom from all breezes. The gulf lies, indeed, in the equatorial belt of calms, and sailing vessels can never make much use of the port of Panama.

Owing to the doldrums at times, variable winds at others, and strong currents sailing vessels have been two and three weeks beating up the Gulf of Panama.

Apropos of doldrums, I remember the case of the British ship Straun, a Canadian-built vessel. She cleared from Panama for Chile early in May in the year 1884, if I remember rightly. She got back to Panama one hundred and five days later. Upon getting out in the gulf she struck the doldrums and beat up and down. Once she got across the line, and for weeks was beating about latitudes 4, 5, and 6 amid constant showers of rains, storms, and puffs of wind. The captain, who was well known to me, had taken on provisions for one hundred days, more than enough to take him to Chile.

These began to fail and the ship's bottom, from being in those sluggish, warm waters, had become foul. The crew spent the greater part of their time in catching and torturing sharks. At last he had to put back to Panama. He had been at sea actually one hundred and five days from the time he cleared from off Isla de Naos. This will give my readers some idea of the doldrums, or region of calms, on that side of the Isthmus, which are one of the most serious drawbacks to any ship canal in that section. Of course I merely refer to sailing vessels. Steamship officers have estimated that at times the currents in the gulf run 3 to 4 knots an hour. I have known of a vessel, making Panama with a cargo of coal, being nearly a month beating up.

The growth of marine life in these waters is astonishingly rapid. I have seen and sent barnacles an inch and an inch and a half long to that well-known scientist, the Rev. Dr. Samuel Lockwood, of Freehold, N. J. These barnacles had grown on the bottom of a sealer that had been cleaned in the Gulf of Panama and cleared for the Galapagos Islands, off the coast of Ecuador, almost under the equator. She came back at the end of four months, when her bottom was so foul she had to be cleaned again, and I received some of the barnacles from her captain. Vessels engaged in that trade should be cleaned every three months, if they are to make good time and save their coal.

Near these islands at dead low water there is excellent and safe anchorge Flamenco, or Dead Mans Island, is within a few hundred yards of Naos. It is largely rocky; its southestern face is a huge cliff, and on its land side, or that facing Naos, is the cemetery from which it takes the name of Dead Mans Island. It is a well-filled cemetery, too. There no end of sailors and officers have found final anchorage beyond the storms and squalls of life. Many of these brave fellows have been the victims of yellow fever. On the face of the island toward the city of Panama one sees a handsome monument which was erected to the memory of the officers and men of the U. S. S. Jamestown, who fell victims to yellow fever while anchored there in the year 1858. Eighty of her officers and crew are buried there. She was sent to the North Pacific and kept there for two years. Then she was ordered to the Hawaiian Islands. No sooner did she get into a warm, tropical climate than yellow fever again developed. Such is the vitality of the germs of that awful disease.

Facing the village of Restingue is a small island called El Moro. At low water it is connected with Toboga by a sand bar, for it is a Siamese twin of the insular variety At high water both are islands. El Moro is a mound like island, about a quarter of a mile long and broad, and some 300 feet high. On its face toward Restingue are the old workshops and dwellings put up by the Pacific Steam Navigation Company. In 1849 and 1850 Toboga was the port of Panama. At times as many as 700 skilled workmen were employed on the islands who were almost without exception Scotchmen. These men were recruited from time to time. Finally the company had to abandon El Moro and transfer their men and workshops to the port of Callao, in Peru, as their workmen were swept away on El Moro by pernicious malaria and yellow fevers.

The transfer cost the company an enormous amount of money, but to save the men they had to make it. The climate to-day is the same as it was when Patterson, the founder of the Bank of England, planted his colony about two hundred years ago on the Isthmus of Darien. He called the city the New Edinburgh, and he considered the Isthmus the "key to the universe." Macaulay tells us how a band of some 1,800 sturdy Scotchmen inside of fifteen months were reduced to three or four hundred, and then the climate and their enemies forced them to leave; and it is related that when they embarked they were too weak to hoist the sails of their vessels, and that the Spaniards, who were largely interested in their expulsion, assisted them.

The seasons of the Isthmus are two in number, the wet extending from about the 15th of April to the 15th of December. The amount of rain that falls is astonishing; it has been given as 128 inches per annum. This, when compared with the small rainfall in Egypt of 9 inches, where M. De Lesseps built his ditch through the sands of Suez, is suggestive.

When the rains come in early and regularly, it means a fairly healthy wet season; that is, of course, for the Isthmus. When the rains are irregular or late, it means a sickly season, and in the hot days between rains yellow fever develops case after case. Then the rain comes on and there is a marked diminution in the number of cases. Again, after hot, sunny days without rain, a new crop of yellow-fever cases results.

The rain often seems to fall in solid sheets of water, the streets being flooded from curb to curb. Such storms clear away as rapidly as they come up, when the sun will light up the green and temporarily clean streets of Panama. Of course, it does not rain all the time, but heavy rains may come on at any moment, and during these months out-of-door work must temporarily cease. With the deep cuts on the canal they play sad havoc, as an immense amount of earth that has been thrown out naturally washes back into the cut. The canal company modestly estimate this at 5 per cent.

Following one of these storms a deep cut on the Colon side of the divide was filled, covering the machinery and all. The long wet season on the Isthmus has been a most serious drawback to canal construction, but as all know who are familiar with the early history of the Panama Canal this practically was entered upon without any previous knowledge whatever further than that there was an isthmus to divide to reflect glory upon France and give unlimited dividends to bondholders. But of the Panama Canal more anon.

The dry season begins about December 15. By many it is considered the pleasantest season of the year, and it is the so-called healthy season. The majority of things are comparative in this world, as we know, and, as a witty actor in "Nadjy" has said, "Everything depends upon something else." It seems to be that way on the Isthmus. It will be well to bear in mind that neat division of the seasons by the dean of the medical faculty at Panama. He said in the wet season the people died of yellow fever in four or five days, while during the dry, or so-called healthy season, they died in from twenty-four to thirty-six hours of pernicious fever. If strangers do not recollect this, the seasons will.

In a country like that, where all is perpetual summer, the average temperature about 80, and the average humidity nearly as great, vegetation is of very rapid growth; and, apropos of humidity, there are places on the upper levels of the Isthmus where it nightly is 100°, the point of saturation. But these conditions make vegetable decomposition as rapid as the growth. The result of the whole is the creation of an intense miasmatic poison. People living on the Isthmus are all malarious, either in one form or the other, and it is impossible to avoid this. It is true that a few escape malaria while resident there, but they no sooner get into temperate climates than it develops. The sallow faces of a great many tell of paludal poison.

My friend Dr. L. Girerd, late chief surgeon of the canal company, instituted a series of most interesting experiments. He examined the blood of newcomers—canal men—and found it in a perfectly normal condition. At the end of a month he examined it again, when he invariably found the malarial bacillus. He was a profound microscopist, and his work in connection with yellow fever was most creditable. Regarding the latter he made a culture of its specific poison, or micro-organism, if you will, and inoculated himself, having a mild form of the disease. There is another factor that has a bearing on this subject of malaria on the Isthmus. It is the admixture of salt and fresh water in the lagoons and rivers in addition to the vegetable decomposition already referred to. This admixture of water is considered to be of great importance in creating intense forms of malarial poison, particularly on tidal coasts like that of the Pacific.

The formalities attending the opening of cemeteries on the Isthmus are somewhat peculiar.

While I was on the Isthmus the new government cemetery was opened with great formality.

The enthusiasm regarding that new cemetery was something astonishing, and the only thing that surprised me was that some individual did not promptly step to the front to contend for the honor of being the first buried. Between the opening in July, 1884, and the 12th of April, 1886, when I made a special visit to the Isthmus, that cemetery had received 3,884 bodies for burial in the ground, and several hundred had been placed in the stone niches, or bovedas. Not only had the new cemetery been filled, but in a section of ground back of the cemetery, in what was part of a large field, there were some dozens of graves. That latter had been opened without any brass bands or government speeches, or any attendance of the consular corps.

The old cemetery was on the left. It was a small place of about three-fourths of an acre, and it received all the poorer classes and patients from the charity and military hospitals and the canal hospitals. Owing to its small size it was dug up year after year; bones and skulls, fragments and coffins, clothing, and all sorts of things were turned out. The liberation of untold millions of disease germs in that country will make clear to thinking people why the Isthmus is so unhealthy. From time immemorial the Isthmus of Panama has been recognized as one of the plague spots of the world. It can vie with the west coast of Africa in pestilential disease.

But for the fact that it is on one of the world's greatest highways between the Atlantic and the Pacific, the systematic unburial of the dead, under the direct sanction of the Federal Government (they do nothing to check it while knowing all about it), and the consequent distr.bution of the germs of yellow fever and smallpox would be of little moment. I say "would be of little moment," for if the people of those Republics are willing to commit suicide in that form, so be it. But owing to the importance of the Isthmus, called by Patterson the "Gate to the Pacific and the key to the universe," these insane and insanitary procedures should be stopped.

The practice that I have referred to regarding the old cemetery and the unburial of the dead came to an end for a time. Together with the late Mr. John Stiven, of Panama, I denounced the system through the columns of the Star and Herald, of Panama, and La Estrella de Panama. So vigorous was our language that it led to the construction of the new cemetery, and people interested in the matter of public health hoped that that most pernicious of practices had ceased. Unfortunately such was not the case. On the same side of the road, adjoining the cemetery just mentioned, was the cemetery, a large quadrangle of bovedas. Facing the highway was a stone fence and an old-time arched gateway of stone. Entering it, one had a full view of what was within. It was a quadrangle of niches or bovedas. Picture to yourself four sides of a square having three tiers of openings in them, one below, one between, and one on top, each opening being large enough to receive the coffin of an adult, and the whole whitewashed and backed by a substantial stone wall. Within the inclosure were several monuments of some people who had been buried permanently.

I used the word "permanently" advisedly. The exact custom which obtains there is as follows: These niches are rented for the space of eighteen months. The coffin is placed within, and the end is closed either with brickwork or with a marble slab having a suitable inscription. At the end of eighteen months, failing a prompt renewal of rent, the coffin and contents are evicted. The eviction is of the most thorough type; it would put an Irishman "to the pin of his collar." The individual holding the concession has his men working within the grounds. If the rent has not been renewed they remove the little marble slab or brickwork and the coffin is taken out and dumped back of the cemetery. Such was the custom prior to our denunciation of that form of unburial of the dead.

In the fall of 1882 I made the acquaintance of a special correspondent of the Brooklyn Eagle, who had seen much in many places and under many circumstances. I promised to show him something that, I took the liberty of thinking, he had not seen previously. He was a pushing, vigorous fellow, and willing to go anywhere and see anything, as long as it gave him some descriptive matter for his paper. I took him back of the cemetery now under consideration and directed his attention to seven and sixty coffins, in all sorts of positions and with all sorts of contents. My readers will be kind enough to remember that the people who are buried in the bovedas invariably belong to the better classes. I took him about among the broken coffins, and the whole coffins, and the skulls, and the bones, and the ashes, and everything else. There they were, just as they had been thrown out.

In the great majority of cases the lids of the coffins were off or had been broken, and within were the restos or remains of former prominent citizens, the majority of whom, of course, were natives. In one coffin were the remains of a woman, and she had had a magnificent head of hair. I must say that the entertainment rather upset the Brooklyn Eagle man, and he was unwilling to stay and hear more about it. The fact that I had made a good collection of crania which I had sent home to Canada ceased to interest him, and he was very glad to get away from the place, admitting that he never had seen the like.

As already stated, it was hoped that when the new cemetery was opened the disgraceful scenes of the past were over forever, but such has not been the case. The present concessionaire is (or was) Señor Nicanor Obarrio, who holds a direct concession from the Government, and he it was who had the new cemetery built under that concession.

As I have already informed my readers, it had been more than filled between the dates given. While on the Isthmus during March, 1888, I went out to see how things were in the new cemetery, and you can fancy my astonishment when finding that all the numbers on the graves had been doubled. That large plot had been filled, and over each grave was a simple wooden cross, painted black. Above was the number of the year, "1884," and on the arm of the cross the number of the grave. As I have said, all the numbers had been doubled. For instance, you would have, say, "3640" on the arm of the cross, below that "1888," and above it in a scroll "1886." The wherefore of it was as follows: In 1886, 3640 was the first occupant, but, as the cemetery had been dug over from end to end, he had been evicted, and twice 3640 was the number of the grave in 1888. Not only were all the numbers in that main cemetery duplicated, but they were digging over the cemetery at the back.

I am fully aware of the fact that this seems a remarkable statement, so remarkable, indeed, that when relating it to some new acquaintances in the British island of Trinidad they looked at me with that polite incredulity that seemed to indicate that they thought that much traveling had not improved my veracity; and it was only when I produced some photographs there and then, showing the graves with double numbers and the digging up of the old graves, that they could believe me. One of my photographs was a revelation to them. In digging up these graves the diggers occasionally came upon a coffin that was in fairly good order. A number of these had been placed upright, leaning against the back wall of the cemetery. These second-hand coffins were for sale to anyone who wanted a luxury of that kind. But for the fact that I had my photographs with me, I feel confident that my statements would not have been accepted as true. But there they were. There was the row of coffins, the double numbers on the crosses—"1886" above and "1888" below.

Now, from a sanitary standpoint, what does all this unburial result in? It results, to my mind, if I understand anything about the matter, that from this criminal practice of liberating untold millions of germs of disease the Isthmus is made a disease-producing and disease-distributing center.

I particularly wish to emphasize this statement, and shall do so in this way: That Colombian cemetery receives nearly all of the dead from the canal hospitals. An immense number of the deaths among their men is from specific yellow fever, properly so called. As that is a land of perpetual summer, perpetual sunshine, perpetual moisture, these germs when liberated find a congenial soil. As the yellow-fever germ is one that flourishes at a temperature of 72°, and as the average temperature is 80°, it goes without saying that these germs never die out there.

Another fact in this connection. Smallpox never is absent in those countries. From time to time there are outbreaks, and two years ago, following the unburial of the dead in the cemetery that I am now describing, there was one just beyond the cemetery at La Boca de la Rio Grande, and there were a great many deaths. My readers must bear in mind that thousands are unburied there annually to this very day and this very hour.

While I was at Panama a number of foreign physicians tried to bring about a different state of affairs. We wrote letters to the press. While the attempt exposed the situation and its dangers, no good came of it. The series of letters to which I make reference was published in the Star and Herald by George E. Gascoigne, M. D., C. M., M. R. C. S., England; Benjamin Stamers, L. R. C. P. and S., Edinburgh, and the writer. As I have already stated, if people wish to commit suicide, from a practical standpoint, let them do it; but let them do it in a way that will not endanger others.

My readers will at once appreciate the danger to all countries doing business with the Isthmus of Panama, or by way of the Isthmus of Panama, as hundreds of thousands of packages of freight cross the Isthmus from the Pacific to the Atlantic and from Atlantic to Pacific, and are distributed in all directions, even to trans-Pacific ports. That these packages are the bearers of disease is well known. The west coast of the Republic of Mexico owes the epidemic presence of yellow fever to the Isthmus of Panama, and all students of that awful disease are well aware that it was by way of the Isthmus that it was distributed up and down the coasts of Central and South America, in many of the ports of which it is permanently domiciled. It is quiescent at times, if you will, but when the suitable conditions obtain, with an unacclimated population, it asserts its sovereignty.

I have shown how physicians vainly endeavored to bring about a reform. Certain it is that nothing can be expected of the Government of the Republic of Colombia as at present constituted.

There is but one way of handling these things. It is by international pressure. We are all aware of the fact that when a small power in Europe is likely to disturb the peace its neighbors say, "We will have none of it," and that is the end of it. Now, there is a power controlling one of the world's greatest highways, and, while it absolutely depends upon other countries for its traffic, it is a disease producer and a disease distributor.

To prevent the slightest mistake in connection with this statement, I refer my readers to the report of the board of health of the State of Louisiana for the year 1882 and the first six months of 1883. On pages 239, 240, and 241 will be found a long letter from Dr. Daniel Quijano Wallace, then president of the board of health of the State of Panama. It was in reply to a letter from Dr. Joseph Jones, then president of the board of health of the State of Louisiana, in which he regrets the deficient organization of the sanitary service of the State of Panama. In the eighth paragraph of that long letter President Wallace speaks as follows:

"It is sad to confess that of the 33 powers represented at the sanitary conference in Washington, Colombia was the only nation that had no sanitary service properly organized, and that did not officially register and publish the prevailing diseases, the death rate, and information relative to public health."

At the close of paragraph 2 is the following:

"I communicate that the actual sanitary condition of the ports of Panama and Colon is, in general, good, as at present no epidemic disease reigns, it being well known that smallpox, the yellow fever, and the paludal fevers, in their infinite varieties and forms, never are absent in these intertropical regions where they are truly endemic."

"Comuniquese les que el estado sanitario actual en las puertos de Panama y Colon es por lo general bueno, pues no existe al presente epidemia reinante ninguna, siendo como es conocido que la viruela, la fiebre amarilla y las fiebres palustres, en sus infinitas variedades y formas, nunca feltan en estas regiones intertropicales en donde son verdaderamente endemicas."

I give both the original Spanish, as published in that report, and the English, that there may be no doubt in the minds of my readers as to the oft-repeated statement regarding the sanitary condition of the Isthmus of Panama. Dr. Quijano Wallace is a Colombian by birth, a man of excellent education, and we served on the State board of health jointly for a time. You will be kind enough to remember that a son of Colombia makes the above statement. The date of Dr. Wallace's letter is, Panama, October 13, 1882.

Apropos of yellow fever and epidemics, the following statement will be somewhat interesting:

"In September, 1884, the harbor of Colon was full of shipping. The latter became infected. The Effecthia, a brig, lost all her crew but the cook. Two French steamers of La Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, named the N. Bixio and the Fournel, lost 20 men. The Royal Mail steamers Larne and Nile also lost a few between September and January, 1885. One hundred and seventy cases had occurred there with a mortality of over two-thirds. I saw the records when in Colon in February, 1885. I visited Colon purposely to see things for myself. The English ship, the City of Liverpool, had six cases on board. She was at the dock, and within 20 feet of her stern was a large pile of rock ballast from Bohio Soldado, being that sold by the Panama Railway to all vessels requiring it.

"The Grace Bradley, an American three-masted schooner, was in the berth next to the City of Liverpool. She had discharged her cargo of ice and was taking in the ballast. Two of her crew sickened with the disease and died. She sailed for a Southern port, United States of America, with a foul bill of health from United States Consul R. K. Wright, jr., of Colon. She arrived at the Southern port late in the fall, discharged the ballast on flat cars that dumped it into the sea, and proceeded direct to Philadelphia. This infected ballast will some day speak louder than words to the people of the South. It comes from an infected port. Ballast of this kind caused three cases of yellow fever in New Orleans in 1882. The ballast was thrown on a street there."

I have reprinted the above from one of my articles on yellow fever, my object in doing so being to illustrate the value of some bills of health issued to the shipping by the civil authorities on the Isthmus. The Fournel, the vessel referred to, lost her captain and nine or ten men. They wished to clear her, and applied to a doctor in Colon, personally known to me, and he issued a foul bill of health. The steamship company would not accept it, but referred the matter to the general agent in Colon. He in turn approached the Government; the then acting President issued a clean bill of health, and the vessel went to sea from a hotbed of the disease.

In the month of September, 1884, the canal company buried 654 officers and men. Perhaps a day may be coming when cremation may be introduced on the Isthmus of Panama, and it would be an effectual way of getting rid of such disease-producing bodies. The disposal of the dead has been attracting the attention of scientists for some time past, now that graveyards and cemeteries are recognized sources of disease, particularly within the Tropics. In the January number (1888) of the Nineteenth Century there is a paper of considerable value on this very theme by Sir Henry Thompson, from which I shall briefly quote:

"Medical and physiological science, too, is daily diving deeper into the cause and origin of disease, and modern discoveries tend to show that infectious diseases, and especially those which are distinguished as zymotic, are due to minute organisms, to which the names of "microbes" or "bacteria," or the more general term of "germs," has been given, and which have a force and vitality capable of resisting many agencies destructive to ordinary life, and even bidding defiance, under favorable circumstances, to the all-conquering power of time itself. It has been clearly proved that these organisms, so far from being destroyed or rendered harmless by the burial of a body, the life of which has been destroyed by them, flourishing exceedingly on the products of decomposition and putrefaction, may at any time be brought to the surface and again set free on their devastating course by the action of earthworms or by any other cause that may disturb the soil.

"This is particularly the case with splenic fever, the germs of which will even affect the grass growing over the buried bodies of cattle that have died from it, and will infect any living animal that feeds upon this poisonous herbage. Malarious fevers, and especially Roman fever, so fatal in the Italian marshes, are well known to be due to bacteria which exists in the very soil itself; and it is generally believed by scientific men who have made infectious diseases a study that scarlet fever, typhoid fever, smallpox, diphtheria, malignant cholera, and many kindred diseases are communicable from the decomposing remains of persons who have died of these disorders and been buried in the ordinary manner."

I shall cite but a single instance in connection with the building of the Panama Railroad in the high level to show what railroad cuts within the Tropics mean. After they had got on the other side of the "divide" toward Panama and opposite Paraiso, a 40-foot cut was made. Owing to the peculiar soil there, when the first rain came the surface became saturated with the greasy soil moved into the cut, burying the railroad to a depth of some 20 feet. This, remember, on a simple cut of 40 feet. One such lesson was ample for the experienced men directing the construction, and a new bed was promptly laid over the old one.

I have already said that the Isthmus furnished nothing in the shape of food; everything had to be brought from the United States or abroad. The laborers came from Ireland and from Jamaica; there were a lot of coolies and no end of Chinamen, Colombians, and Indians. The great bulk of the material likewise had to come from abroad. Tomes in his work gives a graphic and truthful sketch of the swamps and the jungle, and feelingly treats of the climate, regarding which he says:

"When to this was added a climate which disposes, from its prostrating heat, to indolence, and an atmosphere the malignant breathing of which is poison, the result which has been accomplished seems almost superhuman."

He also summarizes his view regarding climate at follows:

"The unhealthiness of the climate has been one of the most serious obstacles against which the enterprise has struggled. I need not dwell upon the causes which produce those diseases which are epidemic on the Isthmus. The alternation of the wet and dry season, a perpetual summer heat, and the decomposition of the profuse tropical vegetation must of course generate an intense miasmatic poison, and I was not surprised when the oldest and most experienced physicians employed on the railway declared to me that no one, of whatever race or country, who becomes a resident of the Isthmus escapes disease.

"I am indebted to the same gentleman for some interesting facts. From him I learned that those who are exposed to the miasmatic poison of the country were generally taken ill in four or five weeks, although sometimes, but rarely, not for four or five months after exposure; that the first attack was generally severe, and took the form of yellow, bilious, remittent, or malignant intermittent fever; that although none were exempt, the miasmatic poison affected the various races with different degrees of rapidity; that the African resisted the longest, next the cooly, then the European, and last in order the Chinese, who gave in at once. * * *

"The system never habituates itself to the miasmatic poison, and complete recovery from fever during a residence on the Isthmus is impossible. The sufferer may arise from his bed of sickness, but totters up and stalks about a mere ghost of his former self. It is thus that I never met with a wholesome-looking person among all those engaged upon the railroad. There was not one whose constitution had not been sapped by disease, and all, without exception, are in the almost daily habit of taking medicine to drive away the ever-recurring fever and ague. The railroad company are so far conscious of the debility engendered by a residence on the Isthmus that they refuse to employ those laborers who, having gone in a healthier climate to recruit, return to seek employment. It is found that such are unprofitable servants, and yield at once to the enervating and sickening climate. The enterprise requires all the vigor of unweakened sinews and of pure, wholesome blood. * * *

"A terrible fatality attended the efforts of the railroad company to avail themselves of the assistance of the Chinese laborers. A ship arrived and landed on the Isthmus some 800 after a fair voyage from Hongkong, where these poor devils of the Flowery Kingdom had unwittingly sold themselves to the service of the railroads, perfectly ignorant of the country whither they were going and of the trials which awaited them. The voyage was tolerably prosperous, and the Chinese bore its fatigues and sufferings with great patience, cheered by the prospects of reaching the foreign land, whither they had been tempted by the glowing description of those traffickers in human life, who had so liberally promised them wealth and happiness. Sixteen died on the passage and were thrown into the sea.

"No sooner had the 800 survivors landed than 32 of the number were struck down by disease, and in less than a week afterwards 80 more were laid by their side. The interpreters who accompanied them attributed this rapid prostration to the want of their habitual opium. This drug was then distributed among them and with the good effect of so far stimulating their energies that two-thirds of the sick rose again from their beds and began to labor. A Maine opium law, however, was soon promulgated on the score of the immorality of administering to so pernicious a habit, and without regard, it is hoped, to the expense, which, however, was no inconsiderable item, since the daily quota of each Chinese amounted to 15 grains, at the cost of at least 15 cents.

"Whether it was owing to the deprivation of their habitual stimulant, or the malignant effects of the climate, or homesickness, or disappointment, in a few weeks there was hardly one out of the 800 Chinese who was not prostrate and unfit for labor. The poor sufferers let the pick and the shovel fall from their hands and yielded themselves up to the agony of despair. They now gladly welcomed death and impatiently awaited their turn in the ranks which were falling before the pestilence. The havoc of disease went on and would have done its work in time; but it was sometimes merciful and spared a life, and was deliberate though deadly. The despairing Chinese could wait no longer; he hastily seized the hand of death and voluntarily sought destruction in its grasp.

"Hundreds destroyed themselves, and showed in their various modes of suicide the characteristic Chinese ingenuity. Some deliberately lighted their pipes and sat themselves down upon the shore of the sea and awaited the rising of the tide, grimly resolved to die, and sat, and sat, silent and unmoved as a storm-beaten rock, as wave rose above wave, until they sank into the depths of eternity. Some bargained with their companions for death, giving their all to the friendly hand which, with the kindly touch of a trigger, would scatter their brains and hasten their doom. Some hung themselves to the tall tree by their hair, and some twisted their queues about their necks with a deliberate coil after coil, until their faces blackened, their eyeballs started out, their tongues protruded, and death relieved their agony. Some cut ugly crutch-shaped sticks, sharpened the ends to a point, and thrust their necks upon them until they were pierced through and through, and, thus mangled, yielded up life in a torrent of blood.

"Some took great stones into their hands and leaped into the depths of the nearest river and clung with resolute hold to the weight which sunk them, gurgling in the agonies of drowning to the bottom until death loosened their grasp and floated them to the surface lifeless bodies. Some starved themselves to death, refusing either to eat or drink. Some impaled themselves upon their instruments of labor; and thus, in a few weeks after their arrival, there were scarce 200 Chinese left of the whole number. This miserable remnant of poor heart-sick exiles, prostrate from the effects of the climate and bent on death, being useless for labor, were sent to Jamaica, where they have ever since lingered out a miserable beggar's life.

"The railroad company was hardly more fortunate with another importation of live freight. A cargo of Irish laborers from Cork reached Aspinwall, and so rapidly did they yield to the malignant effects of the climate that not a good day's labor was obtained from a single one; and so great was the mortality that it was found necessary to ship the survivors to New York, where most of them died from the fever of the Isthmus, which was fermenting in their blood. The laborers now employed, to the number of 3,000, on the road are of the mixed native races, chiefly from the province of Carthagena, negroes from Jamaica, and coolies from the East Indies."

I have been told by a gentleman who is competent to give an opinion, and in whose word I have implicit confidence, that the code of civil procedure of the United States of Colombia is excellent. It is claimed that it is quite the equal of the historic "Code Napoleon," than which there is not better law. The law on the statute books and its application in Panama are opposite conditions. I can best make this point plain by citing a case. In one of the hotels beyond the market a man had been killed, and it was supposed that he had been killed by an Italian. The matter was turned over to the Panama police. For days they could get no information of the murderer. At last it was reported that he was on one of the islands in the bay in hiding. Policemen, armed with Remington rifles, were sent down to find him. They saw the man hiding behind some brushes, fired, and killed him. They brought the body up to the city at dead low water and landed it on the edge of the reef. They fastened a rope to his heels and dragged him over the ledges of rock for fully half a mile. Upon reaching the Taller the body was thrown into a cart, taken out to the cemetery, and buried. Following that, the judicial inquiry was next in order.

Another case in point was that of a soldier, who, while on duty watching some of the unfortunates in the chain gang, was annoyed by a woman. She persisted in bothering him, when he leveled his Remington and shot her on the spot. It was a main thoroughfare. The bullet went through her, went through a woman back of her in the line of fire, and broke the leg of a third. The first two died and the third had her leg amputated at the charity hospital. Immediately following there was a terrific hue and cry; the friends of the "late departed" ran the man down; he was cast into prison and tried, and, despite the facts in the case, his imprisonment consisted of exactly thirty days in a common jail.

The above-mentioned cases are no doubt extreme ones, but to my knowledge they happened. The laws upon the statute books are excellent, but it will be true to say that justice there, like kissing, is a matter of favoritism. At other times renderings in courts are brought about by magical influence that I can not dilate upon.

In speaking about the battery of Panama I referred to the fact that it forms the upper part of the Panama prison. Of all the dreary places that prison really is the worst. It is a huge mass of masonry with gratings, facing a small plaza. The men sleep side by side on a rough board platform. The place is constantly filled by the most disgraceful of odors, owing to the fact that there are no closets. Imprisonment there is little better than death.

Some years ago a keg containing $50,000 in American gold reached the Isthmus. While in charge of the Panama Railroad Company in Panama, the keg disappeared. A number of Americans were arrested and thrown into prison—seven of them, all told. I had occasion to see one or two of them in my professional capacity, and found them shut up in a small vaulted room with a narrow slit in the wall facing the sea. When the door communicating with an outside passage was closed they were in a damp, noisome vault. Their imprisonment was simply iniquitous, for there was no proof against them, and yet those unfortunate men were shut up there for months without being brought to trial, or having any specific charge formulated against them. It was thought then, and it is thought now, that their arrest was simply to screen the real culprits. Despite the fact that representations were made to the American Government, those men languished in that prison for months without redress. After a time they were put "in liberty," to use the term in vogue there, and never received any indemnity. That is another illustration of Colombian justice.

And I may also state that one or two British subjects were likewise locked up for months and months without any specific charge being brought against them, and despite the fact that the British consul protested against it.

Of the Americans who were in prison at that time several are on the Isthmus of Panama to-day, and from the fact that they hold responsible positions it seems safe to infer that the public never suspected them. That money was stolen between Saturday night and Tuesday morning. The Saturday referred to was a holiday, and the Monday following likewise was a holiday, and on Tuesday morning the money was gone. Of course it made a great excitement. It was $50,000 in American gold that had been sent to the Isthmus to be transferred to an American man-of-war, then in the harbor, to pay her crew. The money disappeared, and the individuals referred to were arrested and cast into prison.

The persons to whom suspicion pointed went as free as air. It is said that the money left Panama on an outgoing steamer for California; that an individual left his house at 4 o'clock in the morning, got into a boat, accompanied by a heavy package, and went off in the steamer. Subsequent crookedness in the same man's career would lead one to believe that suspicion pointed its finger in the right direction. Certain it is that from that day to this nothing has ever been heard of that $50,000, and the Americans who were cast into prison never got any indemnification, and doubtless they were as innocent as children unborn.

I simply cite this case as to the peculiarities of law, not tabulated in the civil code of Colombia.

There is no capital punishment in Colombia; ten years is the maximum imprisonment if a man kills a dozen men. It was the isthmian experience that the only individuals who got the maximum punishment for murder were foreigners.

I can remember one case where a Jamaican had murdered a woman and he got the full sentence under the law. During my long residence there I never knew a native of the country to receive it. On the other hand, I can recall a case where an unfortunate American, who had been trading in a schooner to some of the ports north of the Isthmus, on the Atlantic side, had been detected in fraud and arrested. It was alleged that a prominent merchant in Cologne had lost some $700 or $800 by the fraudulent practices of this American. I have already told you of the soldier that received thirty days for killing two women. This American was brought to trial, and, owing to the fact that his prosecutor was absolutely devoid of conscience and that he possessed great political influence, the unfortunate man was consigned to a fate worse than death, by a sentence of three years in a Panama prison.

Every effort was made by his consul to obtain a diminution of the sentence by showing extenuating circumstances, but nothing came of it. If he lived it was to be three years in one of those noisome vaults, breathing the foulest air, owing to the fact that a small cask received everything through the day, to be emptied only at night, and to be fed on a diet not fit for a dog. Such was his sentence. Fortunately death relieved. He went in a well, strong man. Such surroundings, such air, and such food terminated in disease, and his troubles were over. This case is well known upon the Isthmus. I do not mention names, but I could do so. It was iniquitous from beginning to end.

Such of the prisoners as are fit for hard labor are sent out in the streets of Panama to sweep them and to do any sort of work that may be necessary. All of those that have been committed for murder wear a chain. It is secured below by an anklet and above by a piece of rope. They work under a guard of soldiers of the type of that man who shot the two women. One night when in my room at the Grand Hotel I heard a clank, clank, clank, and I looked out to see some of the unfortunate fellows going by in the dark carrying a late comrade out to the cemetery. A man with a lantern led and the military guard followed.

While on the subject of laws, some legislation that was enacted this year may prove interesting to my readers. I have thought it well to quote the law in Spanish, word for word as it was published, and below it to give a careful translation:

"ART. 34. El matrimonio contraido conforme a los ritos de la religion Catolica anula ipso jure el matrimonio puramente cidil, celebrado antes por los contrayentes con otra persona.

"ART. 35. Para los effectos meramente cibiles, la Ley reconoce la legitimidad de los hijos concebidos antes de que se annule un matrimonio civil a virtud de lo disquesto en el articulo anterior.

"ART. 36. El hombre que habiendose casado civil mente, se case luego con otra mujer con arreglo a los ritos de la religion Catolica es obligado a suministrar alimentos congruos a la primera mujer y a los hijos habidos en ella, mientras esta no case catolicamente."

This is the translation:

"ART. 34. Marriage contracted according to the rights of the Catholic religion of itself annuls (ipso jure) a purely civil marriage previously celebrated by the contractants with other persons.

"ART. 35. For the purely civil effects of the law, it acknowledges the legitimacy of children conceived prior to the annulation of a civil marriage by virtue of the provision of the preceding article.

ART. 36. The man who having married civilly marries subsequently with another woman, according to the rights of the Catholic religion, is obliged to provide maintenance for the first wife and for the children had by her so long as she does not marry according to the Catholic rite.

While describing the churches of Panama I referred to the fact that the Church of Rome had been dispossessed and that the priests and sisters of charity had been driven out of the country and that the church had been dispoiled presumably for the benefit of the Government. Of late years Rome has been feeling her way very cautiously, strengthening her hands at every turn, until to-day she feels her strength to be such that, according to the laws quoted above, civil marriages of the past have been annuled. If there is one thing more than another regarding which the Church of Rome has been as "firm as a rock" it has been on the question of divorce—that once married nothing could undo the marriage save the cause of adultery.

It would now seem that, according to the laws of Colombia, the civil marriages that have been in force for many long years can be broken by anyone who wishes to put from him his wife, if the marriage was not according to the Catholic rite. To all lovers of liberty, properly so called, this retrograde movement in Colombia, whose boast is that her laws are the counterpart of the great Republic of the North, will cause both surprise and pain, especially when they think that Rome has struck this blow at the most sacred of institutions.

Under the laws of Colombia the press was at full liberty to discuss any subject. Strange to say, this law has been repealed, and under severe penalties the press is prohibited from publishing anything that reflects upon the civil administration of the Church of Rome. In fact, to such a pass have things come on the Isthmus that the press is no more free than is one of those unfortunates in the prison at Panama. All of this seems the more incredible when we bear in mind that it is a purely republican form of government. The influences back of the Executive are well known. Things have taken such shape in that country that to be a Free Mason means that a man can not be buried in consecrated greund, and the why and wherefore of introducing the iniquitous laws dissolving civil marriage are well known to those in Bogota.

From my recent visits to the Isthmus, and from information received from there while away, I personally am of the opinion that this iron-handed legislation, this violation of the rights of individuals and of the press, can have but one end—a revolution that will shake that country to its center; and rightly so. It is impossible to suppose that any intelligent people who have been as free as the air of heaven can reconcile themselves to legislation of this type, which is unworthy of the autocrat of all the Russias.

On the morning of September 7, 1882, I awoke fancying that some one had got into my room at the hotel and had shaken my bed or got under it. I sat up in bed, looked about the room, but could see nothing, for there was but little moonlight. I couldn't understand the thing, and stepped out on the hotel balcony. While standing on that balcony trying to account for the cause that had awakened me, the whole building trembled violently, and there was a groaning, crunching noise that I never shall forget.

The balcony that I was on was some 45 feet above the street. Before the earthquake, and when taking my room on that floor of the hotel, I had looked around to see what to do in case of fire. As soon as the terrible vibration began I stepped over the railing of the balcony and down on the railing of the balcony of the adjoining house, then jumped to the floor and ran its full length as rapidly as I could. On getting to the end there was a house some 10 feet below me. The only idea I had at the time was that I did not like to die like a rat crushed in a cage. Having had no experience with earthquakes within the Tropics, I did not then realize that it was one. Following the violent shake, all was quiet, and I retraced my steps, climbed up the balcony, and got to the upper balcony of the hotel. My neighbor in the room adjoining mine was Señor Don Pedro Merino. He had tried to escape from his room by a door leading into the upper hall, but the door was jammed and he could not open it. He came to the door of my room, saying that in all his experience in Central America he never had felt so violent a shock. I went into my room, and as soon as I realized it was an earthquake I looked at my watch. It was 3.20. My bath tub had been partially filled with water the night before for my morning bath.

The oscillation of the building had thrown a part of its contents over the floor, bottles were knocked down, others were broken, and the ceiling and walls were cracked. In some places parts of the former had fallen. The wall of that strong building at the back, where it was fully 2 feet thick, showed a crack of nearly 2 inches. We dressed as hastily as possible to get out into the open, and when we got down into the lower hall found the servants gathered there. The building that we lived in was the Surcursale, or annex of the Grand Hotel, and was on the highest point of the city. Hence it felt the vibration more than buildings lower down. When we found the Colombian servants they were sadly frightened. It would seem that when the first shock came they opened a front door to rush out into the street, but did not do so, as the tiles on the house came down in a perfect shower. Immediately following the shock, and before we had walked down to the main plaza, the whole city was alive with exclamations of terror and the streets were full of excited people, many of whom had candles. We got into the plaza a little after half past 3. It doesn't take people long to dress when earthquakes are about.

I shall never forget the scene in the plaza. It was black with people who had reached there in safety and had got in the open and away from the buildings that were expected to fall. There was still a little light, and the moon was in its last quarter. The hum of voices there and the excitement was something astonishing. There they were, people of all classes—black and white—some dressed, and some very hastily dressed, and some had brought chairs with them. An elderly lady, belonging to one of the oldest and most distinguished of Colombian families, was found dead sitting in her chair. It was an old case of heart disease, and it simply required the excitement to kill her.

The upper part of the wall making the front of the façade of the cathedral had been shaken into the plaza; huge masses of masonry had fallen down upon the stone steps in front of the old building, breaking them and driving them into the earth. The cabildo, or town hall, was wrecked. The lower part was a cloister of the old-time Spanish type, with columns and arches. Above there had been another series of arches, giving a front balcony with its roof. The latter with its columns had been thrown into the plaza, and many of them were broken into fragments, while a part of the main roof of the building had been shaken down and off. Its front was wrecked. The canal company's building, while it showed no visible damage, was badly cracked, and a repetition of a shock of equal intensity probably would have thrown part of it down. As soon as a little daylight came in it was found that the arches of the cathedral had been badly damaged.

With the return of daylight all seemed to recover some courage, for if there is anything that unnerves one, it is to feel the earth violently tremble under one and hear buildings groan. There was a vast deal of damage done in the city; walls had been thrown down, and there had been some accidents. A doctor of law in his fright had jumped from a balcony and broken his leg. In a house on the Calle Real a man and his wife had left their bed just as the upper wall of an adjoining building came through the ceiling, burying it under the débris. I should also say that at the cathedral a number of the saints had been shaken from their niches in its front. The old tower of the Chappel of Ease, opposite the Quinta of Santa Rita, had been shaken down, burying a wooden shanty from which the family had just escaped. The only fatality in the city of Panama was that of the old lady who died in the plaza.

As the morning advanced we all became more collected, and speculation was rife as to the exact starting point of the earthquake, the majority fancying that the wave had traveled southward from Central America. At that time the cable ship Silvertown was in the harbor, a huge vessel belonging to the India Rubber, Gutta Percha and Telegraph Company, of London, England. She had just completed the laying of the cables of the Central and South American Telegraph Company, from Peru to the Isthmus and thence to Mexico. The chief of the cable staff, Mr. Robert Kaye Gray, R. F. G. S., was on shore. After hearing all that was to be ascertained regarding the earthquake and examining a number of buildings, together with my quarters in the hotel, which he considered had suffered most, he expressed the opinion that its origin was local. The cable of the West India and Panama Telegraph Company from Colon to the West Indies, and thence to Florida in the States, had been broken. Thus we were shut off from that side, and could get no news from the outside world. The Central and South American cable had been successfully laid, but it still was in the hands of contractors, or Mr. Gray's company.

The interests of the cable company proper were represented by Mr. J. H. Stearns, a gentleman whose patent for duplex telegraphy has made him well known in the scientific world. Thanks to the courtesy of these gentlemen, I was able to send a press dispatch—the very first—over their cable to New York. I sent the Herald 485 words. Later on we got information as to what had happened in other places. The crews of the vessels at anchor off the islands of Flamenco and Naos were roused from their sleep—such as were not on duty—and supposed that the vessels had grounded or were dragging their anchors. The island of Toboga, 9 miles from Panama, had had a severe shaking, and part of the substantial cliff had fallen into the sea. Some people came over to Panama from the Colon side, and then it was that we learned that the shaking in Colon had been there worse than on our side.

From the city of Colon to Baila-Mona the Panama Railroad had been rendered almost useless. In places the roadbed had sunk; in others it was completely thrown out of line, and for two and twenty miles this condition of things obtained. The long bridge, of over 600 feet, at Barbacoas was thrown slightly out of line.

In speaking of Morgan and the Chagres River, reference has been made to Cruz of those days, or Las Cruses of to-day. The latter settlement is not very far from one of the central railway stations on the Isthmus. Previous to the earthquake there had been a substantial stone church there. That building literally had been shaken to pieces. Its ruins were photographed by M. Demers, chief of the photographic service of the Panama Interoceanic Canal Company. Not a piece of the wall 4 feet high was standing. We learned subsequently that several lives had been lost in a small village between Colon and Panama.

With Colon on the Atlantic my readers are tolerably familiar. The majority of its buildings were of wood. The violence of the shock was such that piles of plank, put up in the usual way, were shaken down, and, bad as our experience was in Panama, certainly the earthquake violence there was greater. It was such that people who attempted to walk were thrown off their feet. There were also a few accidents. As usual, under such terrible circumstances, the majority absolutely lost their heads. Strong men, who under ordinary circumstances would have undergone almost anything, were as helpless as children. When daylight came upon the scene in Colon, it was found that a great rent crossed the island from near the substantial stone freight sheds of the Panama Railroad Company right along the front street to the earthen embankment connecting the island with the mainland. Later on a fissure was discovered running along the right bank of the Chagres. It was traced some three miles and varied in breadth from several inches to a mere crack, closing below in a abyssmal darkness.

I was told by Mr. Burns, an intelligent American contractor, who was then mining in the hills between Colon and Panama, that men in his camp were shaken off their feet, and that a mule fell and rolled over and over. That was the earthquake of the first day. The next morning about 5 o'clock there was another one. I did not dare stay in the hotel, as it was so badly damaged. The lofty buildings practically were abandoned, and all who could go out of town went out into the open country, sleeping under tents or any shelter they could get. Business was absolutely at a standstill; the sick forgot their illnesses, and the only subject of conversation was los temblores or the earthquakes. A friend, now resident in St. Thomas, had offered me a shakedown over the Colonial Bank. While nobody was afraid, the sociability was intense. The next morning, at 4.53, there was a violent shake, and we hurriedly dressed and got out into the street. As usual, the whole town was alive; all our fears had been reawakened, and a feeling of impending disaster impressed everybody. When daylight came we were out in the plaza St. Anna, and well do I remember the first penciling of light along the horizon and the quiet delight with which we welcomed it.

While severe earthquakes during the day are bad, in the darkness of night they really are appalling. On the second night after the earthquake I accepted an invitation from another friend, whose building was not so lofty as the bank in which I had passed the previous night. He adopted an ingenious device, well known in earthquake countries. In subsequent press letters I dubbed them "Stearnes earthquake detectors." He stood two soda bottles and a number of mineral bottles on their mouths. Any shock would upset them and give an alarm. The tremor that night was but a slight one, and on the third night I slept in the hotel proper in a way, for we were all so unstrung by the intense nervous strain that restful sleep was out of the question. The building of the cable company, in which I passed my second night, was so damaged that one of its walls subsequently had to be stayed up and secured. At the time the Panama Canal Company had a maregraph at Colon, and it was found that there had been a species of tidal wave, as indicated by the perpendicular tracings made by that instrument.

As I have stated, the Panama and West India Company's cable was broken, and the other cable was not open to the public, as it had not been transferred by the directors to the company, and consequently we were shut off. There is a general impression that "news travels by post," but, as an exception to the rule, I may here state that, upward of a month subsequently, we received information on the Isthmus to the effect that a tidal wave had swept some of the islands on the Atlantic side in the vicinity of the Gulf of Darien. It swept across them, washing away ranchos and inhabitants, and some 65 people perished. But, as I have said, we only learned this a month later. It would seem that the center of seismic disturbance had been a little to the south of the Isthmus of Panama and almost opposite the old Isthmus of Darien. Hence the tidal waves that swept the islands in the archipelago in that direction and the earthquake wave which so violently shook the Isthmus.

I kept records during the "shakes." After the fifth day there were no strong, but many minor, ones. I have notes and records of them by the dozen.

The third violent shock was about the fourth day; it occurred about 11 o'clock p. m., when, in common with others, I was tremendously pleased to get into the Plaza Triompha and out in the open. The only idea that seems to actuate one under such circumstances is to get away from buildings or anything that can fall upon one. While we were in the plaza—everybody talking to everybody, for on such occasions formalities do not exist—there were violent shakings, and in a street near us there was a rush and considerable excitement caused by a hysterical woman shrieking.

On the afternoon of that day an old acquaintance of a friend of mine had visited his house and, it being late at night, asked the privilege of staying there. She was allotted a room and a hammock. On the morning subsequent to this last shock they found she was not awake and thought she had overslept herself. Later, finding she did not move, they approached her hammock and found her dead; another case of heart disease, her death being caused by excitement.

While making no professions of bravery, I have yet to learn that I lack the courage common to most men, but for weeks after that experience, when in the quiet of my room at night, surrounded by cracked walls, whenever I allowed my mind to dwell upon the awful scene, I would shiver from head to foot. It was an awful experience. If there is any one thing that utterly unnerves one it is an earthquake of that type—one that will shake buildings to pieces, partially destroy a railroad, and create the havoc and destruction of that terrific earthquake of the 7th of September, 1882.

As soon as it was possible to collect reliable data I sent a series of letters to the Montreal Gazette, and they were published in extenso. Following their publication there was a lot of scientific discussion in the old country as to what would be the effect of an earthquake on a completed canal. Scientists took the ground that the embankment on the side whence the wave came would suffer most, and that an earthquake of that violence would seriously damage any canal.

As soon as possible I instituted careful inquiry as to the history of the early earthquakes on the Isthmus, for when I became a resident there I had no knowledge of earthquakes, nor had I ever heard of any in connection with that neck of land.

From the typical "oldest inhabitants" I learned that the earthquake in the fall of 1858, that had so damaged Cartagena, on the Atlantic, had done a great deal of damage in the city of Panama. I also learned that upward of a century ago the country had been terrifically shaken from Santa Fe de Bogota to Panama, and that about 100,000 lives had been lost. Some ten years prior to the earthquake of 1882 there had been a violent shock, the greatest force being felt in the State of Antioquia, to the south of the Isthmus. A pueblo, or village, called Cucuta, was literally shaken, and upward of 5,000 people lost their lives. It will be seen that earthquakes in Colombia are not modern inventions.

A remarkable feature in connection with that earthquake period at Panama must not be overlooked. It would seem that my dispatch to the New York Herald was cabled abroad, and it all but produced an earthquake among M. de Lesseps's shareholders. He at once informed the world that there would be no more earthquakes on the Isthmus. Strange to say, despite the utterances of this celebrated man, the earthquakes kept on, to the unstringing of our nerves and to the contradiction of even so distinguished an individual as Count Ferdinand de Lesseps.

Another statement in connection with this and I have done. Such of my readers as are familiar with the historic Paris Congress of May, 1879, that was called together to consider the Panama Canal, will remember that M. de Lesseps denounced any Nicaragua route as impracticable, owing to the fact that it was a land of earthquakes, and that the only route was that at Panama.

The only interpretation that one can place on such a statement is that M. de Lesseps had settled on the Panama route before calling the scientists together. And such was the case. That he, as an intelligent man, could have made such a broad statement savors of absolute ignorance regarding the past of the Isthmus, as that indefatigable traveler and great authority, Humboldt, refers to the particular formation of parts of Colombia and the terrific cataclysms that must have obtained there in early days.

Within the last few days I note that the adjoining Republic of Ecuador has been violently shaken by earthquakes, and so violent were they that they produced a panic among the people. What effect such earthquakes would have upon a tide-level canal are best imagined and description is unnecessary.

The present status of the Panama Canal may be defined by stating that, after seven years' work and an expenditure estimate of over $220,000,000, M. de Lesseps has abandoned his pet tide-level scheme, and at the eleventh hour adopted locks. About one-fifth of the work originally planned has been done. The fixed charges of the company to-day on their shares and bonds and the maintenance of the Parisian and isthmian offices exceed $22,000,000 per annum. This does not include the turning over of a single shovelful of earth.

A word regarding the Eiffel contract, regarding which one hears so much. It is probably one of the most remarkable documents that was ever drawn up between a contractor and a corporation. All of the provisions are absolutely in favor of the contractor. He exacted a huge deposit, for as much as $1,000,000, or 5,000,000 francs, were placed to his credit in the hands of two banking firms in Paris before he commenced any work at all. Then his staff that was sent to Panama was paid six months in advance by the canal company. One of the engineers on that very work told me, while in Panama in March, 1888, that the contracts called for 10 gates at $1,000,000 each, while the masonry and wherewithal to constitute a lock was to be a separate charge. Thus we have ten millions for 10 gates, and, say, five millions for masonry; total, fifteen millions. The fact never to be lost sight of is this: That M. de Lesseps has stated that they are to be temporary locks. These are his own words.

With his usual nonchalance, in comparison with which an arctic temperature is midsummer, he has assured his countrymen and countrywomen (for there are upward of 30,000 female shareholders in the canal) that while the locks are working he will go on digging down to tide level alongside of his lock canal. This is probably one of the most remarkable statements that has ever emanated from human lips, and for a variety of reasons. Picture to yourself a lock-level canal built through the ever-yielding clayey soils of the Culebra. Let us say that that is done. There is no water on that level with which to aliment or feed a canal.

Pockets are to be constructed on the side of that hill as mountain reservoirs. By strengthening their walls with a backing of iron plates they hope to make them strong enough and large enough to hold M. de Lesseps's promises—I really beg his pardon—I mean water, to aliment the upper levels of the Panama Canal. This water has to be pumped from distant streams. Let us say the pumping apparatus gets out of order, then we have no water and the canal will be useless on that occasion. On the other hand, let us say that the reservoirs are full, and that there is one of those sociable little earthquakes, such as have been alluded to, and the walls of the reservoirs give way, break into the main ditch, and sweep away the locks.

Again, let us say that everything goes along just as they have stated—smoothly and the like. Then, according to M. de Lesseps, in that narrow mountain gorge in the Culebra he is going down to tide level. In view of the fact that the sides of the Culebra move into the cut at the rate of some 18 inches per annum—and that on a cut of less than 8 feet—what can one expect will happen to his lock canal after he has got below its level?

In short, the building of a tide-level canal alongside of the lock canal is a physical impossibility, and there are no modern underwriters that would put a dime of insurance on vessels going through a canal at that time.

As we are all aware, M. Eiffel is building a thousand-foot tower, to be completed for the opening of the Paris Exposition in 1889. As M. de Lesseps boasts that he has behind him half a million of share and bond holders, perhaps they will ascend that tower and stretch their eyes toward the west to look for the Panama Canal, in the same way that the Spanish King gazed froma window and said that he thought Panama could be seen, owing to the cost of its walls.

The engineer in the Eiffel employ, from whom I obtained many of the details just used, told me there never will be a canal on the Isthmus, with or without locks. When the present money is exhausted a crash is inevitable.

In fact, I made bold to make a forecast while at the American Association for the Advancement of Science, at its meeting in Cleveland on the 15th of August, 1888, when, in my paper before the section on engineering, I stated that within six months the company would be in hopeless bankruptcy and that M. de Lesseps's famous petite gens de bas de liane would be hopelessly ruined.

The bursting of this South Sea bubble No. 2 will shake France to its center. Add to this the commercial stagnation in Europe and the ever-increasing darkness in the political horizon and you have a group of facts sufficient to appall all having any interest in the Panama Canal. La Belle France is laden down by a huge debt, already three times that of the United States of America. This is constantly increasing, and the bursting of the canal bubble will hasten a financial crisis in France that unquestionably will affect all having commercial relations with her.

Despite the rose-colored statements to the contrary, very little real work is being done on the Panama Canal at this writing. Work has been stopped on a number of sections, the nominal excuse being that they are completed. But such is not the case. Work has been stopped because the company is without means to pay the contractors. At this time lawsuits aggregating several millions for damages and for breach of contract are hanging over the Panama Canal Company. A lot of its plant on the Isthmus was advertised for a judicial sale, and among other things that were enumerated in the list were the canal company's hotel and their works and plant at the Boca. That was for a judgment of $400,000. The case, I believe, has been settled, and a number of contractors who have been dispossessed and whose contracts had been given to others for advanced rates have sued the company. One of these contractors, M. Murraciole, a Frenchman, recovered 1,000,000 francs damages.

The famous bureau system is what has obtained on the Isthmus up to the present time, with changes and amplifications without number. There is enough bureaucratic work and there are enough officers on the Isthmus to furnish at least one dozen first-rate republics with officials for all their departments. The expenditure has been something colossal. One director-general lived in a mansion that cost over $100,000; his pay was $50,000 a year, and every time he went out on the line he had his displacement, which gave him the liberal sum of $50 a day additional. He traveled in a handsome Pullman car, especially constructed, which was reported to have cost some $42,000. Later, wishing a summer residence, a most expensive building was put up near La Boca. The preparation of the grounds, the building, and the roads thereto cost upward of $150,000.

The way money has been thrown away is astonishing. One canal chief had built a famous pigeon house while I was on the Isthmus recently. It cost the company $1,500. Another man had built a large bath house on the most approved principles. This cost $40,000. Thousands and tens of thousands have been frittered away in ornamental grounds, for all had to be beau, utility being a second consideration.

M. Rousseau was sent to the Isthmus in 1886 by his Government to report upon the Panama Canal. His inspection was to be preliminary to the emission of a lottery loan, providing his report was favorable. M. Rousseau was a keen, practical man. While it was quite true that theatrical effects were introduced, he was not deceived.

During my last visit to the Isthmus I went over the work, notebook in hand, and made 60 photographs. I can summarize all by stating that the effect was more than depressing. The canal company take credit for $30,000,000 worth of machinery on the Isthmus of Panama. The greater part of this machinery has been left out in the open, and a prominent engineer told me that two-thirds of it is absolutely useless, and it would not pay to take it away for old metal. Five millions of dollars have been spent in creating a very pretty, well-kept tropical town at Christophe Colon. Sidings are covered with valuable engines and all kinds of movable plant which are out in all weather and going to ruin.

The canal hospitals on the Panama side are without doubt the finest and most perfect system of hospitals ever made within the Tropics. There are upwards of seventy buildings, and their cost has been over $4,000,000. The service alone is simply huge.

Mr. MORGAN. This concludes what I had intended to say in this connection, Mr. President, my purpose being to bring these papers to the attention of Senators, with this exception: Senators who vote for this canal to be located in Colombia will understand the people with whom they are to deal and the Government they are to deal with, and the thralldom which is placed on that Government by the conditions of the present law in the Republic of Colombia.

In this article Dr. Nelson deals with a number of subjects, and he is in close accord with the sworn testimony of witnesses who were heard before the committee. I have been surprised that even an ignorant witness, such a man as Mr. Plume, who was a mere trackmaster for six years on the Panama Railroad, should have referred in almost the same language to the very same identical facts that Dr. Nelson had published in 1886. And so in regard to other matters connected with his testimony.

Dr. Nelson deals with the country at large, and in particular he deals with it as to the formation of the country, geological structure, rainfall, climate, the structures and habitations, churches, hospitals, the health and the causes of diseases, the bills of mortality, the cemeteries, the earthquakes, the winds, the civil laws and their enforcement, as well as the ecclesiastical law which I have just incorporated in my remarks. Is he to be believed? In the letter in which I was introduced to this gentleman there was a reference to a very distinguished man of this city—Bishop Henry Y. Satterlee. I wrote to him to ask him about this man's character and whether he knew him. On the 9th of June, 1902, Bishop Satterlee replied as follows:

MY DEAR MR. SENATOR: In response to your letter I would say that I have known Dr. Wolfred Nelson for a great many years, as he was my parishioner for several years when I was rector of Calvary Church, New York.

He is a man in whose integrity, truthfulness, and Christian character I have always had perfect confidence.

Very sincerely, yours,

HENRY Y. SATTERLEE.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
United States Senate.

I am not bringing before the Senate newspaper accounts and squibs for the purpose of trying to produce a sudden impression upon the minds of Senators, but I am bringing sedate facts here that are established by perfect testimony, if human testimony can be considered perfect. This gentleman was not writing about canals. He was giving a narrative of what he saw, without prejudice and without passion, and without purpose except to write a book for the instruction and information of his friends, so that we can rely upon what Dr. Wolfred Nelson has said about Panama, and if it is to be relied upon it is an absolute impossibility for the Congress of the United States ever to venture to locate a canal in that region.

Now, on the subject which has been mooted here and which has been drawn into question since the committee closed its hearings, for the point was not made while the committee had the subject under consideration—that of earthquakes in different places—there is a great account, and I have no doubt an important one, given through the newspapers, of an earthquake in Guatemala which occurred some time early in the last month. I find here printed to-day the advance sheets of the Consular Reports, June 10, 1902, the following statement from James C. McNally, consul-general, dated at Guatemala city, May 9, 1902:

RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION IN GUATEMALA.

The work of constructing the Northern Railway from El Rancho to Guatemala city is progressing most encouragingly. The grading has been completed to Sanarate, about 50 miles from Guatemala city, and from there the work will be rapidly pushed forward. I am informed that the road will be finished within the time specified in the contract, and that six months from now trains will be running between Puerto Barrios and Sanarate. From the latter place to Guatemala city a stage line will be established.

The completion of the Northern Railway will be of great benefit to Guatemala, as it will considerably shorten the time to New Orleans. Only about six days will then be required to reach the United States from this city, while the trip on the Pacific side takes from seven to twelve days longer. Freight transportation also will be cheaper than by the Pacific route. The railroad was not at all affected by the recent earthquakes, and work on it is progressing in a businesslike way.

JAMES C. MCNALLY,
Consul-General.

GUATEMALA CITY, May 9, 1902.

Now, if that earthquake in Guatemala, which is said to have killed 5,000 or 7,000 people, did not stop the work on a railroad built close to the scene of it, it seems to me we are wasting our time in hunting up conjectures about what will happen either in Panama or Nicaragua in respect of earthquakes. The evidence which comes to us officially of these matters, and also such evidence as Dr. Nelson has stated in the paragraphs I have quoted from his book, shows that a country may have a long state of repose, and perhaps we might call it an accident if an earthquake ever should overtake a railroad or a canal dug in almost any part of the world.

We have no security that this Capitol will not be shaken down some day by an earthquake. We felt the effects of earthquakes in Washington until they were very sensible to me, to say the least of it, but I never had any apprehension about what would happen to a canal or railroad that might be usefully dug at Charleston or at New Madrid, in the northeastern part of Arkansas and the southeastern part of Missouri.

It is my duty, Mr. President, to this case and this occasion to try to bring forward substantial facts upon which the Senate can act reliably in respect of a matter that we must all be cautious about, and we must look forward with a great deal of scrutinizing attention as to what may be the difficulties under which the canal may have to be constructed and thereafter be maintained and operated.

If there is any one duty which I feel I owe to my country on this occasion above all others it is to fairly represent and truly state, with every shade of coloring that might be necessary to bring out the exact state of facts, those matters which bear upon the question of the selection of this route and the construction of the canal and its maintenance after it is built. I would not for anything in this world leave behind me the reputation of having, in the face of evidence, selected a route that in the slighest degree gratified my personal ambition or that I thought would make more in favor of my own section of the Union than another.

So far as the Panama route is concerned, it is to be run only by steamships. Sailing vessels will have nothing to do with it. The statements made by Dr. Nelson from personal observations through six years of the effect of the winds in the harbor at Panama show that the route is not available for sailing ships, and every single member of this Commission admitted that the canal was being built with reference to steamers only and not with reference to sailing ships.

Mr. President, I have the honor to represent a State here which has the largest deposits of coal anywhere near the Gulf of Mexico. Coal can be taken from the Birmingham region in Alabama at a dollar a ton and delivered on board of a ship for a dollar and a quarter a ton. It is as fine steaming coal as there is in this world. If I were to consult the peculiar interests of Alabama I would strike every sailing ship out of competition with Alabama in the consumption of that coal.

If the steamships will also adopt oil for fuel for their boilers, as they will, what country can exceed Texas in her opportunities of winning money by abolishing the sailing ships of the world, and having all commerce conducted on steamships? There at Beaumont, where the earth itself, without the danger of a strike, forces the oil to the surface, and where it is piped out to the sea, and where ships can come and load their tanks with oil without the necessity of doing anything but going to anchor, is the finest field of exploitation for making money out of a peculiar advantage that exists anywhere on the American continent; yet I suppose that the Senators from Texas would scarcely vote to strike down the Nicaragua Canal because it is the only one projected that can accommodate the sailing ship.

While on that subject I wish merely to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that by the acceptance of the Panama route, as is shown by the evidence incontrovertibly, and as is admitted by every member of the Commission, we strike the sailing ships out of existence so far as the commerce of the Pacific is concerned, unless they double Cape Horn.

Now, what is it that we strike down? What is the value of it? The number of sailing ships in the United States, and particularly ships that are upon the coastwise trade, is very much larger than the number of steamers. There are more of sailing ships now upon the ocean under the American flag that could pass through the canal to trade with the Pacific Ocean than there are of steamers. We at least cut our fleet half in two by selecting the Panama route, and refuse them access by canal to the Pacific Ocean. Can we afford to do that? Can we possibly afford to make that discrimination against so great an industry as the sailing fleet of the United States?

Why should we throw them away and deny them these privileges and benefits? For the sake of making $5,000,000 in a trade with the Panama Canal Company? Is that the consideration? That is all I have heard of. We do not do it for the sake of getting a country that is healthier, or a line that is shorter, for the Panama route is not shorter for sailing ships by fifteen days or for steamers by at least two days, if not four. Why do we throw away these benefits for the purpose of taking up a canal that cuts off the sailing ship, makes a longer route, and absolutely destroys our coastwise trade, which will hereafter in days that we are not dreaming of, I am afraid, fall into the hands of some foreign monopoly?

SUFFERERS BY EXPLOSION OF AMMUNITION CHEST.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 5094.

Mr. MORGAN. Without prejudice to the present order of business?

Mr. CULLOM. Of course, without prejudice to the pending business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the pending business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 5094) for the relief of the persons who sustained damage by the explosion of an ammunition chest of Battery F, Second United States Artillery, July 16, 1894.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that $15,845.23, the sum found just by a board of officers convened at Chicago, July 17, 1894, under Special Orders, No. 72, issued by command of Major-General Miles, of the Department of the Missouri, which sum is recommended by him, with the concurrence of the then Major-General Commanding the Army, be appropriated to pay the awards of the said board, according to the schedule as set forth in their report made on November 3, 1894, and published in Senate Executive Document No. 21, third session Fifty-third Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MERZELLAH MERRILL.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5882) granting an increase of pension to Merzellah Merrill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "sixteen;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Merzellah Merrill, late of Company C, Tenth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3653) for the protection of the President of the United States, and for other purposes. The Chair will state that the amendment of the House of Representatives is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert a substitute.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I would suggest that the Senate nonconcur with the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference; but I understand that one member of the committee rather prefers that the amendment should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. If that be so, I shall not make any objection to it taking that course.

Mr. BACON. Ordinarily, Mr. President, I would concede that the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is correct, but this is practically an entirely new bill. It is really the bill that the House of Representatives had framed before the Senate had ever acted upon its bill. The House substitute their own bill, simply using our enacting clause, and that is all there is of it. I think that, under these circumstances, the amendment of the House of Representatives should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR. As a single member of the committee I have no special choice, but my own impression is—and I may as well state it publicly—that if the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, it is probable, considering the lateness of the session and the condition of public business, that it can not be disposed of at the present session, but will probably have to go over to the next session. If the Senator from Georgia, who is a member of the committee, prefers that the amendment of the House of Representatives shall be referred to the committee, I am willing that it shall take that course.

Mr. BACON. I should think the Senator had better move the reference of the House amendment; otherwise we shall have a conference over an amendment of the House of Representatives, which is really a new bill, without the Senate ever having had it under consideration.

Mr. HOAR. I will move that the amendment of the House of Representatives be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I will repeat I do not believe that the committee will be able, with the other matters that are pressing in the closing days or weeks of the session, to deal with this subject so that the bill can be acted upon before next winter.

STANLEY & PATTERSON.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11591) for relief of Stanley & Patterson, and to authorize a pay director of the United States Navy to issue a duplicate check.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The preamble recites that it appears that Henry M. Denniston, pay director in the United States Navy, did, on the 5th of February, 1901, make and issue a check, No. 456714, bearing date the 5th of February, 1901, upon the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, in favor of Stanley & Patterson, for $2,680.21, in payment for electrical supplies furnished the United States Navy Department; and said check was, on the 5th of February, 1901, mailed by Henry M. Denniston to Stanley & Patterson, at 32 Frankfort street, New York City, N. Y., and was lost in transmission through the mails and has never been received by Stanley & Patterson; and the provision of the act of February 16, 1885, amending section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing United States disbursing officers and agents to issue duplicates of lost checks, applies only to checks drawn for $2,500 or less.

The bill provides that Henry M. Denniston, or his successor in office, shall be instructed to issue a duplicate of said original check to Stanley & Patterson, under such regulations in regard to its issuing and payment as have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the issuing of duplicate checks under the provision of section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 11, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

TRANSFER OF ADMINISTRATION OF FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the pending measure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the pending measure, which is House bill 11536.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 11526, to transfer certain forest reserves to the control of the Department of Agriculture, to authorize game and fish protection in forest reserves, and for other purposes. General debate having closed, the Clerk will read the bill by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the President is authorized to transfer by Executive order any of the forest reserves to the control of the Department of Agriculture, and when so transferred all the laws relating to the same under the Department of the Interior shall apply to their regulation, administration, and control in all respects under the Department of Agriculture, and all powers heretofore vested in the Department of the Interior in relation to such reserves shall be exercised by the Department of Agriculture as to any of the reserves so transferred under this act: Provided, That the President shall not transfer any reserve under this act until the Secretary of the Interior and the Director of the Geological Survey shall certify that the boundaries thereof have been fully examined and are by them deemed to be substantially the proper permanent boundaries: Provided further, That the power of the President to eliminate from such transferred reserves any portion thereof shall not be abridged, and in case of the elimination of any part of such transferred reserves by the President such portion eliminated shall be retransferred to the Department of the Interior as public land: And also further provided, That as to surveys and surveying, and as to exchanges of lieu lands, patents, titles, and claims, the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior shall be still retained: And also further provided, That any officer of the Department of Agriculture whose duty it is to receive money, with reference to the forest reserves transferred to that Department, in pursuance of this law, in the place of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and receiver, as mentioned in the act of June 4, 1897, shall give bond in such sum as may be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The following amendments recommended by the committee were read:

In line 13, page 2, strike out the words "patents, titles, and claims" and insert "entries, claims, patents, and titles."

Add at the end of the section the following:

"And also provided, That hereafter no forest reserve in any State shall be created, enlarged, or extended without the approval or written request of the governor of such State, made prior to the creation, enlargement, or extension thereof."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a motion which, I think, if it prevails, will save time. I would like to test the sense of the committee on a motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, which motion takes precedence of the committee amendments.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to be recognized. I would say to the gentleman from Iowa I would like perchance to talk in connection with this bill, not strictly on the bill, but on matters associated with it, the condition of appropriations and revenue.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, at some time during the closing days of the session it is always desirable that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations should give us the benefit of this summing up; and if it suits the convenience of the Committee of the Whole, it would be a good time at this time.

Mr. CANNON. It is hardly the summing-up statement that comes at the closing of the session, I will say to my friend, although if I get to that part of it it will bear upon that question. The present state of appropriations is what I want to speak of in connection with the business of the House, and incidentally in connection with this bill, as it is a part of the business of the House. But that part of the speech is not strictly, of course, on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there is some question as to whether a motion to strike out the enacting clause is debatable at all except by unanimous consent in Committee of the Whole, but the Chair understands the gentleman from Illinois to ask unanimous consent to speak upon the motion, and incidentally upon matters of appropriation.

Mr. LACEY. How much time does the gentlemen from Illinois want?

Mr. CANNON. I am inclined to think I can get through in thirty minutes. If when the thirty minutes are over and I have not got through and the Committee of the Whole seem to think that I ought to have a little more time, they will grant it to me, and if they do not it will be pretty conclusive evidence that I ought to stop. [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. Will not the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his motion and let the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. RODEY] make a motion that he had to make, and then the gentleman from Illinois present his later on?

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad to do that, but to save time I think my motion had better be made now, and then, after it is debated, to have the matter voted upon, because I believe a good deal in taking a vote after the question is debated.

Mr. LACEY. I have no objection, Mr. Chairman. I hope the committee will have none.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Illinois does not propose to discuss the pending matter before the House. I have listened with a good deal of attention and always enjoy listening to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, but there are gentlemen on this floor who have not had an opportunity to speak, and I hope the gentleman will not take up unnecessary time in talking about matters foreign to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the committee for thirty minutes on his motion. Is there objection?

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if it is the understanding that at the end of the thirty minutes this measure be voted upon without further discussion?

Mr. LACEY. Not at all; the question of striking out the enacting clause is too vital a question to be disposed of without debate.

Mr. CORLISS. How much time does the gentleman think it would take?

Mr. LACEY. I do not know; we want ample time to dispose of this bill.

Mr. CORLISS. An hour?

Mr. LACEY. That will depend upon the action of the committee.

Mr. CORLISS. I do not feel disposed to object, but I want to ascertain how much time is likely to be consumed.

Mr. LACEY. I will say to the gentleman I want to get the bill out of the way as early as possible.

Mr. HULL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. As I understand, this bill is not limited as to time, and it must proceed until it is disposed of?

Mr. LACEY. My friend from Michigan wants to call up another measure, and I want to say to him that this bill will be got out of the way as speedily as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. At this point, in order to avoid possible misunderstanding later, the Chair calls attention to the fact that whether a motion to strike out the enacting clause is debatable at all, or, if so, to what extent, is a matter upon which the precedents are conflicting. In the second session of the Thirty-third Congress (February 7, 1855, Globe, p. 616) Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, in the chair, sustained the point of order made by Mr. John S. Millson, of Virginia, and ruled that "the motion is not debatable." In the Thirty-fifth Congress, first session (December 22, 1857, Globe, p. 154), Mr. John S. Phelps, of Missouri, in the chair, a similar ruling was made, and on an appeal the decision of the Chair was sustained.

On the other hand, in the Forty-seventh Congress, second session, the point of order having been made by Mr. Hiscock, of New York, was submitted by the Chair to the Committee of the Whole and not being sustained, the motion was apparently treated as debatable without limit (Hinds's Precedents, p. 941). This ruling was made without much discussion or citation of precedents, and was manifestly wrong. As the motion to strike out the enacting clause is not in order at all in Committee of the Whole until general debate has been closed, it certainly can not be, under the rules properly construed, the subject of general debate. Such a motion is in order after the first paragraph of the bill has been read for amendment under the five-minute rule. It is now made at that point.

The present occupant of the chair is of opinion that it should be treated for this purpose as in the nature of, or at least analogous to, an amendment and debatable accordingly, and in this view is apparently sustained by the observation of Speaker Blaine in the first session of the Forty-third Congress (RECORD, p. 2338), who, in ruling that such a motion when made in the House was debatable, said:

> There is no express rule prohibiting its being debated in Committee of the Whole. The impression prevails that it is not debatable from this fact that the motion is usually made in Committee of the Whole after debate has been closed or when the five-minute debate is in order. The motion in Committee of the Whole to strike out the enacting clause would never by any usage of the House be debated over five minutes on each side, and generally not debated at all.

The Chair holds that the motion is debatable five minutes on either side, and after that only by unanimous consent.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent of the Committee of the Whole to occupy thirty minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the remarks of the gentleman have application to the pending bill?

Mr. CANNON. They will; and I will say to the gentleman in that connection that I want to make a statement as to the present state of the appropriations and revenues.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I may have something to say on that question myself. I did not think this was hardly a proper time to discuss appropriations and matters of that kind on this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I hope to make my remarks appropriate.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman is then going to address himself to the pending bill?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I crave for thirty minutes of the attention of the committee; and first on this motion to strike out the enacting clause; and it is necessary, if the committee will bear with me in discussing the propriety of that motion, to speak of the public service, as it now is, in the Office of the Commissioner of the Land Office and the Interior Department—the abuses of the service, if any, as now carried on, and the service as it now is; in the Agricultural Department—its nature and the abuses of the service, if any there are, and the necessity for the proposed change, if any. Now, I will very briefly state the conditions.

In 1789, just after the adoption of the Constitution, the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office was created. It continued from that time down until 1849, when it was placed under the Secretary of the Interior, where it still remains. It is a great service. It has covered the public lands and kindred services from the time it was organized to the present. It is thoroughly organized.

Here let me state that there are now in the Land Office at Washington, as employees, 388 persons, at a cost of $502,430 per annum. In addition to that, touching depredations upon the timber lands—the public lands throughout the Republic—there are 69 special agents—69 persons who are watching depredations upon the lands of the United States—timber lands alone. Incidentally this service covers trespasses on the public lands, also destruction of timber, also forest fires; but substantially the service relates to trespasses and the despoiling of the timber. This service cost $185,000 per annum.

In addition to that, on the forest reserves—46,000,000 acres in round numbers—there are 349 persons employed by the Government—rangers, agents, superintendents, who are engaged touching those forest reserves—forest fires, the sale of dead and down timber, the use of timber and stone by the settlers and by the miner, and so on. One very important object of the work of these 349 persons in the forest-reserve service is the forest fires, and, incidentally, the whole service in connection with that subject. Those 349 persons cost $300,000 per annum.

Now, it will be seen that almost $1,000,000 is the cost of the General Land Office alone and these persons that I speak of—an annual charge.

Now, in addition to that; there are in this great office of the Secretary of the Interior what is called the Secretary's office—that is the staff of the office, if you please, embracing many bureaus in the office of the Department. The Secretary's office proper has 241 people in it, costing per annum $314,410. It is a complete staff of assistant secretaries, chief clerks, appointment clerks, a complete disbursing office for the whole interior service—patents, Indians, pensions, surveys, and so on. So that in theory and in practice during almost a hundred years this service has grown up and is adjusted in a certain way.

Now, the Land Office proper is divided into 11 divisions. It is unnecessary I should name these specifically, but in a general way I may say that among these 11 divisions there is a law division, there is a claims division, there is a patent division, there is an entry and preemption division, there is a mineral division, there is a swamp-land division, there is a division that pertains to Indian reservations, there is a railroad division, and there is a forestry division under which is made this expenditure of $030,000 for the force in the field alone. If there is a trespass on the public lands, whether it be in the forest reservations or outside, there is the legal machinery, there are the agents, there is the "whole shooting match." It is like "Topsy;" it growed, and it has been growing for a century.

Now, in these forest reservations there are 46,000,000 acres. There are applications pending to add to these forest reservations 54,000,000 acres, but there are 46,000,000 acres now. Outside of Alaska, not appropriated or reserved—I mean free lands—in acreage outside of Alaska, outside of the Indian reservations, outside of the forest reservations, there are 546,000,000 acres. So that I am safe in saying that while there are 46,000,000 acres in the various reservations, there are three times 46,000,000 acres of the same kind of land not in the various reservations—in the mountains and in the valleys. So that you have 46,000,000 of acres in forest reservations, 546,000,000 of acres outside of Alaska of general public lands, and two times as much in timber outside of the forest reservations as in the forest reservations. Here is an imaginary line between the two.

Now, I say this much to call your attention to the status. Now, what does this bill propose to do? I have it here. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to transfer the administration of the forest reservations, the care and sale of timber, the use of timber by the settler and the miner, the care and preservation of the forests, the sale of timber, all of these things, to the jurisdiction of the Agricultural Department, leaving in the Interior Department the other 514,000,000 of acres, over 100,000,000 of timber, the same kind of timber and stone that there is in these forest reservations, under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department, and they propose in addition to leave the question of lieu lands in the reservations with the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

You understand what lieu lands are. In these forest reservations there are many, many thousands of private owners of lands. Under the law they can exchange those lands by conveying them to the Government for an equal acreage outside of the forest reservation. That is to be left with the Interior Department. Then, in all the forest reservations, mineral titles may be obtained and are constantly being exploited and developed. That is left under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department. Now, then, here is the divided jurisdiction that this bill proposes to make, and in making it, it proposes to make at the very beginning a complete staff of officers in the Agricultural Department, or what would result in it, to receive the moneys from the sale of timber.

Under the law as now in force, if there is a sale of timber or stone the receivers of the General Land Office, scattered all over the country, receive that money, without cost to the Government or without additional cost. This bill authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to make an officer of that kind, and that means a complete staff of receivers upon every forest reservation, and frequently at various points upon the forest reservations. That is to follow by regulation and a little later on by appropriation.

Now, it has been alleged from time to time, and no doubt truly alleged, that the administration of the public lands and of the timbered and forestry land and of our park systems throughout the great West have not been perfect. In the nature of things they could not be perfect. On the average they are 2,000 miles away from Washington. How could they be perfect? Yet I am here to say that, in my judgment, in the main this jurisdiction and duty has been exercised fairly well. I think it might be improved. I believe it is being improved. Some people believe that we do not give enough money for this service. Perhaps we do not, and yet it is a service that costs a good deal, you will see.

Now, what is the proposition? I have stated it already. To take these forest reserves—part of the jurisdiction—away from the General Land Office, away from the Interior Department, and drop it into the Agricultural Department. What is the argument for it? Oh, they say, we have got a Forestry Division already organized there in the Agricultural Department. Well, that is true. Let me show you how much of a one you have and what it does. A Division of Forestry rests in appropriation alone—there has never been any organic act—a Division of Forestry was appropriated for in the Agricultural Department in 1887, and an appropriation of $8,000 was made. What for? For science in forestry.

That is the only function it has ever had—not administration, not sale of timber, not sale of stone, not sale of dead and down timber, not the policing of the use of timber by miners and settlers, but pure and simple forestry; how best to reforest, how best to preserve forests. That is the service. Well, from 1887 to this time see the growth. For the coming year the Bureau of Forestry in the Agricultural Department is to cost $291,860, almost as much as the whole personnel of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in Washington.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me state to the gentleman, if you will permit me, that the number employed in the Agricultural Department is 39.

Mr. CANNON. I am speaking of the whole service. They have many hundreds of people, I have no doubt. We have never been able to get a statement. The House put a clause on the agricultural appropriation bill that, if it was not stricken out in conference, will compel a statement of the expenditure of every dollar of this appropriation. I have got to draw on my imagination for its expenditure. College professors, students, wise men, and so on, and so on, throughout the length and breadth of the country, who investigate. I am not here to say it is not necessary; I am not here to abuse it. I am not here to abuse the scientific people anywhere.

They have added great things to the United States; they have added great things to civilization. Henry, with his telegraph; Morse, the Yankee, with its development—invention here, there, everywhere—eminent physicists, great men. Some of them could not set a hen, it is true. Some of them could not make a faint imitation of a hoe handle; most of them are entirely impractical in everyday life, and most of them if turned out to depend upon the twist of their own wrist to live would starve; yet that is their specialty, that is their calling.

It takes all kinds of people to make up a world, and the investigators, the inventors, the scientific people have stood adding great things to civilization. They are great in their lines. Of course we have the usual curse, because there is no great achievement anywhere, in war or peace, that requires brain or brawn but what as the men achieving move along they attract into their wake the alleged experts, the alleged scientists, in journalism the alleged journalists, in law the alleged lawyers, in medicine the alleged doctors.

There are some pretenders, do you not see, where there is one real doctor, and sometimes, I think, where there is one real lawyer, where there is one real scientist, where there is one real inventor. They pop up and say, "Look at us scientists; here we go." And they are industrious to fasten upon the public teat. Now, I do not think this Bureau of Forestry in the Agricultural Department belongs to that class. I have not had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Pinchot, who is at its head. I am told he is a graduate of Yale, a man of perhaps 40 years of age, a man with a comfortable fortune, a man who has studied this question at home and abroad, an exceedingly astute, accomplished man. I am glad he seems to be made of the right kind of stuff, notwithstanding he was born with a gold spoon in his mouth. I have no abuse for him. God bless him and speed him in his work; but it is scientific work. My friend is estopped to say that this Bureau over there has nothing to do.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to ask——

Mr. CANNON. In a moment.

The Bureau is a cheat and a fraud if it has nothing to do. If every dollar of this $300,000 for that scientific Bureau is not needed, and if every man in it is not earning his money and doing great work for civilization, then it is a fraud and a cheat.

It is for science, it is for essays, it is eminently respectable, and I have no doubt eminently able; but I do not want to take from this other great office, that has grown for a hundred years, that costs this great amount of money, that has its disbursing officers and its law division, that has all the records, that has jurisdiction of all the balance of the public lands, including the timber; that has this great force, that has concurrent jurisdiction in many matters even in the very forest reserves that are proposed to be transferred. I do not want to take them and transfer them over to this division of scientists in the Agricultural Department, that has no law division, that has no disbursing office adapted to this service, that is not familiar with these questions—nay, nay.

That is a proposition that can not meet my assent, because in my judgment it but duplicates the expense, clashes the jurisdiction, brings disorder where there is now some degree of order; and having divided the mountain to cure alleged maladministration, you will have two sets of people to watch and supervise, running and glorifying side by side; and if this bill should pass, there come trooping after in the deficiency bill next winter and in the regular agricultural bill hereafter the necessary accompaniments for this service, disbursements, law, trespasses, all that kind of thing.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What I wanted to ask was this: Under this system of lieu lands which the gentleman has described, a great many controversies arise?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is, the title to the land selected very often fails by reason of prior claims and mineral rights that have been established.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, the Government has already taken the title to this land. Where are you going to settle these questions? Which bureau of this concern will have jurisdiction of it?

Mr. CANNON. In the lieu-land matters and mineral-land locations, the Interior Department; in the sale of stone and timber, in the sale of dead and down timber, in the use of these forests by the settler and by the miner, with trespasses upon them, you go to the Agricultural Department, without a law officer in it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And into a scientific department.

Mr. CANNON. And into a scientific department. You mix the two. You take a horse that was beautifully built for careful stepping, a high stepper, clean limbed, well groomed, mane and tail flowing, tail up in the air, and put upon that kind of a horse duties that are practical, that relate to matters of trespass, matters between everyday men in everyday life, and you say to this fine-groomed horse, "Bear this burden," that should be borne by a horse, if you liken a human being to a horse, that is there every day and Sunday, that will stand without hitching, that will bear a burden if necessary, that will ascend the side of a mountain and pull a man up after him hanging onto his tail, and always ready for duty, and if necessary will work single or double, and will pull a dray as well as a coach.

Oh, no; your horse is not the kind of horse to do for that character of service. There is no time to stop to catch a bug. The catching of a bug is important. To watch the growth of trees is important. It is important to know whether some bug with an unpronounceable name is bred in the leaves of a certain tree, and what will cure it. That is scientific; but in plain, practical, everyday affairs, with matters relating to the settler, with matters relating to the miner, with matters of lieu-land men and with trespassers, you have got to have a practical set of people. Well, you may say now, we have science in the Interior Department. Yes; quite important. But you want to have with it a scientific division.

Why, I tell you what we can do. The gentleman from New York by law could lift up Mr. Pinchot, with all his scientific staff, and set him down in the Land Office of the Interior Department. Why, already we have a bureau of forestry in the Interior Department. There is an eminent scientist at the head of it, with practical men doing practical work. Forestry is there, practical forestry is there. Why divide it? Why build up these useless bureaus that I believe are absolutely unnecessary. "Oh, but," says my friend, "the President recommends this." Yes, in general terms. But the President did not have in mind the multiplication of offices. What he really recommends was more efficient work touching forestry. It is his privilege to recommend; it is his duty to recommend.

Oh, but my friend from Iowa, Brother LACEY, you are as disloyal to his recommendation as I am, because he recommends the transfer of forestry to the Agricultural Department; but equally as strong he recommends the transfer of the Geological Survey, costing a million a year. You are silent about that. You skip that, and read low when you come to that. [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask my friend this: Of course that matter is not connected with other land surveys and it will not be involved in this bill. What does he think about it—whether it would be a good plan to transfer the Geological Survey to the Agricultural Department; yes or no?

Mr. CANNON. It would be much better than to transfer the Youst Reservation, because——

Mr. LACEY (continuing). Perhaps that ought to go also.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Because the Geological Survey does not have a law office; it does not deal with trespassers or the sale of timber, but makes surveys, studies geology, delves down into the earth, so to speak, and tells us prophecies of what the hidden mysteries are. It also does topographical work. It has got no duties to perform that can not be performed by the Agricultural Department or under its direction and without the creation of a law division or without any of these other questions.

Now, just a word further as to the President's message. I am not a hero worshiper; but I am glad, as we had to lose McKinley, formerly our colleague here, who by the hand of the assassin was taken from us, I am abundantly thankful that Theodore Roosevelt succeeded him. I believe in him and sustain him. Touching all questions involving policy I am with him; but it is his duty to recommend, and in recommending he recommends and deals with ten questions not involving policies of the party where he recommends or deals with one that does. This in no sense involves the policy of the Republican party or of the Democratic party. It is not a partisan service, and the only question for us to ask is ought it to be done; would we get better service than we do, and would it duplicate the present service; would we have a clash of jurisdiction; would we have the expense doubled, and would we have responsibility divided?

When you answer those questions you will know whether the enacting clause ought to be stricken out of this bill or not. In my judgment such action should be had. Oh, but, says somebody, have not you got lax administration in the Land Office? Well, I think there is some poor administration there. I think there always has been; I think there always will be. We are not going to have the millennium anywhere, including the General Land Office, during my remaining years; so that there will be something of imperfection; but if there be imperfection there—and I say so without abusing the present head of that great office, because I have served with him and he is a strong and able man—I say they can improve an imperfect service there, and if there be a lax service it is a matter of administration to correct it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I do not want to weary the House, but still I should like to have a few more minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. CANNON. I only want a few minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his colleague may be allowed to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I have helped report appropriations for almost twenty years for this service, and I will be frank with you, there never has been a year passed by but what the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whoever he was, whoever was Commissioner, under Cleveland, under Harrison, under Cleveland again, under Hayes, under Roosevelt, but what has protested with this great increase of duty, with the increase of the forest reserves, with the increase in population and the great number of questions arising, but what he has protested he ought to have an increase of appropriation to properly administer it.

Congress would increase it from time to time. Perchance we have not given the increase that ought to have been given, and yet it has been a fairly good service. I want to keep it so. My friend from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], with this bureau of scientists, ought to keep them at their trade. They have grown in five years from $8,000 to $300,000. How much good they have done I do not know, but I hope a great deal. I know there are bright people upon the board, but keep them to their trade. You had as well set a minister that has graduated at a theological school to pounding iron as to set this bureau over there to practical work in connection with these reserves.

Ah, but do we not need their work under this same administration? Yes, and we are getting it in the division of forestry in the General Land Office. We have got the scientific men there, and it is quite within the power of the Executive, if the Commissioner of the General Land Office ought to be changed—and I do not say or intimate that he ought—it is quite within his power to put a man there that will fill the bill. And so of the head of every bureau of every division. Let us have better administration. When you split up this matter, when you parallel and duplicate appropriations and jurisdictions, you increase expenditures and divide responsibility.

Now, I think I have said about all on that that I want to say. A word in conclusion, and it bears upon this question, because if this mountain is divided and half is taken to Mahomet instead of Mahomet being brought to the full mountain, if the good of the service requires it in the General Land Office, I undertake to say that inside of five years this service of the 46,000,000 acres of forest reserve will be costing this country at least $5,000,000. Bring Mahomet, if you have got him there, over to the mountain, because here is the mountain fully developed.

Here is the law department and here are all the records. It would be better than to divide the mountain, if you would take the General Land Office and all its organizations and transfer it over there to the Agricultural Department and include the Geological Survey. You do not propose to do that. This policy, in my judgment, is evil and only evil, and expensive; aye, extravagant.

Now, upon that word extravagance bear with me just a few moments. It has been on my mind for a week or two to call attention to what this Congress is doing by way of appropriations. I want to remind you of what the Secretary of the Treasury said in his last annual report as to revenues and expenditures for the current fiscal year, and I want to give you what the budget will be as near as we can get at it, when the gavel falls a few weeks in front of us, and what the probable revenues will be to meet the appropriations we are making. I will put two or three little tables in my remarks, with the consent of the House.

Take the estimate of the Secretary. At the beginning of this Congress the revenues—he estimates them in detail for the current year 1902 at $688,000,000 in round numbers.

After we have cared for the sinking fund, which is $53,000,000, and have paid everything, we will have an apparent surplus of $47,000,000. That is for the year that expires June 30 of the present month, $47,000,000 for the current year.

For the coming fiscal year we will have $639,000,000 of revenue, the closest estimate we can give, taking into consideration the act passed this session removing the last of the Spanish war taxes. And now, upon the basis of the existing status of the appropriation bills—that is, take the appropriation bills just as they stand to-day, incomplete, it is true, but it is perfectly safe to say that they will not be materially reduced—taking the status of the bills that have passed and become laws and those pending in conference, and what have you as an aggregate of the regular annual bills in their present stage? They amount to $590,686,404.61. The permanent annual appropriations amount, including interest for the coming year, to $69,000,000, almost $70,000,000. That makes $660,000,000 that our appropriation bills will carry; I mean the regular bills and the permanent appropriations.

Now, for the miscellaneous appropriations of this session, including the omnibus claims bill, the provisions for new buildings, only the provisions necessary to begin and carry on the buildings until the 4th of March next, miscellaneous items, a great lot of things, these will amount to $10,000,000 at least. The deficiencies already provided for this year amount to $21,838,000, with more to follow. This makes a grand total of $691,445,000.

Now, while the deficiencies will doubtless be paid in the main during the current fiscal year and from its revenues, yet it is hardly probable that a less sum on account of deficiencies will have to be provided for next session on account of the next fiscal year, 1903, and paid from its revenues.

The requirements of the sinking fund for 1903 are estimated at $54,000,000. But count out the sinking fund. We can pay it or not, as we choose. We are many, many years in excess on the sinking fund. We are paying it this year; next year we shall not pay it, probably. Putting that $54,000,000 out, not taking it into the calculation, the apparent excess of appropriations at this session—exclusive of the sinking fund—over the total estimated revenues for 1903 is $51,925,128. It can not be less than that. We are marching up to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do you mean to say the deficiencies will amount to that?

Mr. CANNON. I mean that the apparent excess of appropriations will be $51,000,000. A friend near me asks, "Will it all be spent?" No; but I will tell you just about what will be spent. There is always a considerable margin between the actual expenditure for a fiscal year and the total appropriations of a session of Congress, and judging from the past, the apparent excess of appropriations this session over estimated revenues will be quite offset by this margin. There you have it, without the Panama Canal or a Nicaragua Canal, without the omnibus fish-hatchery bill, without the cable bill, without a hundred other things, some of them meritorious, some of them not meritorious, all pressing for appropriations.

If we should authorize the Panama Canal, there you have $40,000,000 out of the surplus at once. If we should have a cable, there are great expenditures at once. Without regard to those, from the present standpoint, from the present action of Congress as it is to-day, it will take every cent of money that we receive the coming fiscal year to pay the expenses that we appropriate for, those in sight, without the extraordinary matters to which I have referred.

Gentlemen may ask why I am worrying them about this matter. Because it is in sight; because I want to come to this side of the House and say, from the partisan standpoint, that when we are caring for the public service we must from this on call a halt; because as sure as the sun comes up and the sun goes down this is to be the result.

"But," says some one, "there will be enough—yes, and perhaps to spare." "Oh, we have a great surplus," say some. Yes; but it will vanish like the dew in the morning sun. If we should buy the Panama route or locate the Nicaragua route, there is not enough in the surplus to pay the required expenditure of construction. If we should provide for the sinking fund (though we do not have to) that would take $54,000,000 more. I tell you, gentlemen, the party in power, and the whole Congress, which takes in both sides, should weigh carefully and long the appropriations and the legislation that authorize expenditures before we march up in our legislative authorizations to exceed what the revenue will be the coming year.

Now, I have just submitted these facts and estimates to you—not as an alarmist, not for party capital. Oh, gentlemen on this side, there is no party capital in it. I have submitted to you plain, cold statements of fact. Let us pull together on both sides of this House, in the interest of all parties and of good government. Let us cut the garment according to the cloth.

Now, let me test by this statement a hundred schemes that are trooping and coming to this House and the Senate. Good heavens! Brother WADSWORTH, possibly the scientists may "in the sweet by and by" develop fish that will climb trees and live on dry land. I do not know about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. What has that to do with the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. CANNON. But until the scientists have done that we have gone far enough in that direction.

And I will say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS], in whose statesmanship and ability and patriotism I have great confidence, that it is a grave problem whether the Government should undertake, at an expense of $15,000,000, to construct a single cable to the Philippines or whether we had better let the citizen do it—whether it is not always better to let the citizen do that which can be equally well done by him than for the Government to do it. [Applause.]

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. Does not the gentleman know that had the Government of the United States during the past four years owned a cable across the Pacific connecting our possessions she would have saved twice the amount of the cost thereof in the expenses that have been rendered necessary because we have not had such communication?

Mr. CANNON. I did not intend to discuss the matter; but I think my friend from Michigan is away off in his statement. I do not think that the tolls have been $30,000,000 or anything like it, but I will not discuss that. I merely referred to it in passing. You may say, Why do not you speak of the Panama and the Nicaragua Canal? Well, we will discuss them in time. I am for an isthmian canal, but I want to recollect old Davy Crockett's maxim, "Be sure you are right, then go ahead." But these are larger matters that involve great questions of statecraft which I will not discuss, but they are coming, trooping in the aggregate 50,000,000 upon that Calendar and upon the Senate Calendar, which, if they never are vitalized by enactment, the 80,000,000 of people in the United States never will suffer one ten thousandth part of an ounce. Now, Mr. Chairman, I once went to a revival meeting. [Laughter.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. This is another joke.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. When?

Mr. CANNON. When I was a boy, and the speaker talked about the necessity of getting religion, and exhorted us, and finally called me out by name. Said he, "JOE CANNON, why don't you start?" I replied, "Well, there is to be a party up at Lusk's next week—old Salmon always gave a dance once a year, on New Year's—and I want to go there, and I want to do this, and I want to do that and the other."

"Young man, young man, start now! You may not have a chance to-morrow!" [Laughter.]

Now, then, I am for starting now. This bill confuses jurisdiction; it begets extravagance; the public service does not demand it, and the best thing to do with it is to cut its head off right back of its ears and strike out the enacting clause. [Applause.]

The statements referred to above are as follows:

Fiscal year 1902.

The revenues of the Government for the current fiscal year are thus estimated upon the basis of existing laws:

From customs	$250,000,000
From internal revenue	282,000,000
From miscellaneous sources	40,000,000
From Postal Service	116,633,042
Total estimated revenues	688,633,042.00

The expenditures for the same period are estimated as follows:

For the civil establishment	$110,000,000
For the military establishment	115,000,000
For the naval establishment	70,000,000
For the Indian Service	11,000,000
For pensions	137,000,000
For interest on the public debt	29,000,000
For postal service	116,633,042
Total estimated expenditures	588,633,042
Or a surplus of	100,000,000

The requirements of the sinking fund for the fiscal year 1902 amount to $53,000,000, and, when met, will reduce the estimated surplus of revenues of $100,000,000 for the year to $47,000,000.

Fiscal year 1903.

It is estimated that upon the basis of existing laws, December 2, 1901, the revenues of the Government for the fiscal year 1903 will be:

From customs		$250,000,000
From internal revenue		290,000,000
From miscellaneous sources		40,000,000
From postal service		132,020,630
Total estimated revenues		712,020,630
Estimated reduction in foregoing revenues under act of April 12, 1902:
Internal revenue	$68,000,000
Customs on tea for half year	4,500,000
		72,500,000
Net estimated revenues, 1903		639,520,630

The regular annual appropriation bills in their present stages appropriate	$590,686,404.61
The permanent annual appropriations for 1903, including interest on the public debt and customs service, but excluding the requirements of the sinking fund, are estimated at	69,921,220.00
	660,607,624.61
The miscellaneous appropriations of the session, including the omnibus claims act, provision for the new buildings that have been authorized, etc., will probably aggregate	10,000,000.00
The deficiencies already provided for this session amount to	20,838,134.22
	691,445,758.83

The deficiencies will be paid in the main during the current fiscal year, and from its revenues, but it is not probable that a less sum on account of deficiences will have to be provided for next session on account of the next fiscal year, 1903, and paid from the revenues of that year.

The requirements of the sinking fund for 1903 are estimated at $54,000,000.

Apparent excess of appropriations, exclusive of sinking fund, at this session over total estimated revenues for 1903, $51,925,128.

The usual margin between actual expenditures for a fiscal year and the total appropriations at a session of Congress will equal the apparent excess of appropriations this session over estimated revenues.

Available cash balance, exclusive of gold reserve in Treasury June 9, $201,526,342.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I find that my friend from Illinois is now just as he was at the revival meeting to which he refers. He is "unwilling to make a start;" he is unwilling to take a first step in the way of scientific control of the forests of the United States. He says he will not follow the Administration. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Well, the President and I are pretty close together.

Mr. LACEY. It has been reported that the President once said of the gentleman who has just taken his seat that he "loved him so well that he felt sometimes that he met with unrequited love" [laughter], and in the present instance, Mr. Chairman, here we have my friend, who is the most useful man in this House, simply endeavoring to prevent something that he does not fully understand and endeavoring to divert the action of the House by laughing at scientific terms and scientific purposes.

It has been told about a great scholar that when a fishwife, in Billingsgate, called him all manner of evil names, he turned upon her and denounced her as an "isosceles triangle and a rhomboid," and it almost broke her heart. [Laughter.] She said "no woman had ever been so abused since the world began;" and if my friend can find some scientific term, the Latin name of a bug, to laugh at, he can divert the attention of this House from some serious purpose and thus prevent it from making a step in the direction of a more scientific consideration of the interests of the United States. We have made the start. We have a scientific division of forestry.

We have it in the only scientific department of this Government, the Agricultural Department, and it is only a few days since that this House set its seal of approval upon the scientific work of that Department by ordering 200,000 extra copies of a horse book prepared by scientists of that Department. We have a Department there that is doing good. It is not very expensive. It is true that it costs something, but we can not have anything good in this world without some expenditure.

That Department, the gentleman tells us, started in with $8,000 of expenditure. If he would go back one year further he would find that there was no such Department and expenditure at all. To-day $291,000 are appropriated by this Congress for forestry, and the gentleman says that we should not have the forests administered by a scientific bureau, but they should be administered by a law division of the Land Office, by the clerks and lawyers sitting at their desks in the Interior Department, instead of by scientific trained men who will go and put themselves upon the ground and examine the necessities of the forests that they are to take care of.

I do not yield to my friend in his admiration for the President of the United States, and it is fortunate that we at last have a President who knows the United States of America west of the Missouri River. The situation there is perfectly familiar to him as a ranger, as a forester, as a cattleman, as a farmer, as a hunter, as a full-blooded, live American citizen. Let us read now what he says on that subject. It is very brief. In his message he says:

> At present the protection of the forest reserves rests with the General Land Office, the mapping and description of their timber with the United States Geological Survey, and the preparation of plans for their conservative use with the Bureau of Forestry, which is also charged with the general advancement of practical forestry in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LACEY. I will be very brief, Mr. Chairman. I will not abuse the courtesy of the committee. I took more time yesterday than I really wished; but after the speech that we have heard here from my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] there must, of course, be some time taken to answer it. The President says:

> These various functions should be united in the Bureau of Forestry, to which they properly belong. The present diffusion of responsibility is bad from every standpoint. It prevents that effective cooperation between the Government and the men who utilize the resources of the reserves, without which the interests of both must suffer. The scientific bureaus generally should be put under the Department of Agriculture. The President should have by law the power of transferring lands for use as forest reserves to the Department of Agriculture. He already has such power in the case of lands needed by the departments of War and the Navy.

We have Indian lands. Questions of title over the Indian lands are not settled by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but they are settled by the law officers of the Land Office, and the law officers of the Land Department are controlled by mandamus and by subsequent proceedings in the courts of justice. There is no difficulty about the present proposition at all. We have two bureaus—one of them in the Land Office that is trying law suits, and another in the field that is looking after the intelligent management of the forestry of the United States of America.

My friend laughs about fisheries, and talks about "fishes that will climb trees," and all that. Well, now, that is very amusing; but this country has awakened to the necessity of taking care of the fisheries. It has awakened to the need of taking care of the natural resources of the country. We have wasted and squandered the natural gas in Ohio and Indiana until it has been taken out of the houses and factories in many parts of the State. We are wasting the oil in many localities. We have destroyed the timber with fire and with the ax, absolutely without any regard to the future.

If an intelligent system of forestry had been adopted fifty years ago, it would have been worth untold millions to this day and generatio.n Where do you get your shingles from to-day? From Oregon. They are shipping shingles from Oregon to Nebraska, Iowa, and New York. We have destroyed by fire the best forests of this country. Forests have been burned down almost in an hour that it took thousands of years to grow. With the same utter disregard of the future we have so crippled our natural resources that the people of the United States have turned their attention at last, slowly but earnestly, toward their preservation and protection. I am sorry to hear my friend from Illinois taking the position that he now assumes.

I am accustomed to sit at his feet and listen to the words of wisdom as they fall from his lips. But I regret to find him of late so often disputing and controverting matters outside the jurisdiction of his committee, talking about subjects that he has not carefully examined, and occasionally marring the symmetry of his political record by going wrong. He has done so in this particular case, I am sorry to say. Out in Montana when Lewis and Clarke were crossing the mountains about one hundred years ago they found a river which had an Indian name that, translated into English, meant "The River-That-Scolds-All-Others." That river bore this name until finally it was given a more pronounceable name for modern use.

Now, I do not want my friend to degenerate into anything of this kind. There are many things that need to be opposed and stricken down. There are many times when a halt is necessary to be called; but he who calls a halt on everything finally fails to produce a halt on anything.

Now, this is a very simple, plain proposition. We have two bureaus of forestry, or rather a Bureau of Forestry on the one hand and a Division of Forestry upon the other. We are paying the expense of both. We are making appropriations for the management and operation of both. Which is the better of the two?

Mr. MADDOX. Does your bill incur any additional expense in caring for them?

Mr. LACEY. I endeavored to answer that matter fully yesterday, and I will briefly answer it again. We have two sets of men in charge of forestry, one in the Department of Agriculture, scientific, skilled men, and in fact nearly all of the skilled foresters in the United States. The Adirondacks, which have cost the State of New York $4,000,000, have been administered under the supervision and general management of this Bureau. The proposition to make a forest reserve in Georgia, North Carolina, and Tennessee, and to protect the Appalachian chain with a fringe of timber, has been looked after by the Department of Agriculture.

All the various forestry matters have been considered by that Bureau. But we have a Division of Forestry in the Land Office that takes care of the timber, and that employs the rangers who put out fires. This bill will simply transfer those rangers, who will look after that timber, watch it, and protect it. It transfers them to the Department of Agriculture to work for the Bureau of Forestry instead of staying in the legal branch of the Government, the Land Office of the Interior Department.

Mr. KLEBERG. The gentleman will permit me to interrupt him. Of course I agree perfectly with the distinguished gentleman from Iowa, but the criticism that is made, especially by the gentleman from Illinois, was in reference to the difficulty in receiving and disbursing this money from timber sold.

Mr. LACEY. I will say to the gentleman that under proper regulations, instead of that making trouble it merely simplifies the matter. Instead of going to the land office of the district in which the land is situated the purchaser of timber will get a post-office order, which can be sent to the Agricultural Department, and practically it is a saving to anybody who wants to buy the timber. It simplifies and cheapens the operation instead of increasing it, and would take away the commission now paid to the registers and receivers of the land office.

Now, my friend from Illinois has charge of the appropriations that keep up the Interior Department, for the Geological Survey. These appropriations are safe in his hands, and I am glad to be able to say to his credit they have been generous and liberal. But he does not have charge of the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture; and it is perfectly natural that he should fear that if the operation of this passes out from his hands it would not be well taken care of. I might be just as jealous as he is. This bill would transfer from the Committee on Public Lands these matters, where they now are, to the Department of Agriculture, and to a committee to which I do not belong.

Now, we should not consider these personal matters in this way, but should consider them with a view as to what is best for the future interests of the whole people of the United States. The Administration has not asked this without due and full consideration, and both the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture ask it. It adds no dollar of expense to the Government in any form whatever. It ultimately would dispose of and eliminate the expenses of the bureau in the Interior Department, and is therefore in the interest of economy.

I want to read what the Secretary of the Interior says about it in his report:

> Forestry is a business which can not proceed without skilled men with a practical knowledge of the best ways of handling and protecting forests. As with lumbering, its success depends on work in the field, and especially upon intimate knowledge of local conditions and requirements. It is of the first importance to employ in the forest service men of high local reputation for character, ability, and knowledge of the woods, in addition to such practical trained experts as may be available. Men thoroughly versed in lumbering and woodcraft are essential.
> The time for the introduction of practical forestry on the forest reserves has fully come. States and private owners of forest land are already cooperating with the Government for the better handling of their holdings to the extent of more than 5,000,000 acres. Some of the forest reserves are not less favorably situated for practical forestry than the best of these lands, and it is of the first importance both to the interests of the forest and to the interest of the West to give the reserves the best practical treatment without delays It was found necessary about two years ago to apply to the Agricultural Department for working plans for conservative lumbering on the reserves and for reports upon all subjects requiring special knowledge of forestry, except the mapping of the forests, now thoroughly well done by the Geological Survey.

* * * * * * *

Forestry, dealing as it does with a source of wealth produced by the soil, is properly an agricultural subject. The presence of properly trained foresters in the Agricultural Department, as well as the nature of the subject itself, makes the ultimate transfer, if found to be practicable, of the administration of the forest reserves to that Department essential to the best interests, both of the reserves and of the people who use them.

To that I yield my hearty approval. I believe it is in the interest of economy, and ought to be adopted; and I will not, Mr. Chairman, weary the patience of the committee any longer after the length of time accorded to me in the debate on this bill on yesterday.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LACEY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri for a question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It was not my privilege to listen to the gentleman on yesterday, but I would like to ask my friend whether he has submitted any figures showing the profits of forestry in foreign countries?

Mr. LACEY. I have not submitted those figures, nor do I believe they would be a safe basis for us to rely upon, because the situation is very different and prices of timber quite unlike. But in Germany, the country to which my friend no doubt refers in his question, and also in France, they have found forestry not only practical, but profitable, and the Government has made the handling of timber lands a permanent source of their revenue, bearing all the expenses of their maintenance and becoming an asset instead of a liability.

The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has handed me a statement which will answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri, and I will insert the same in my remarks, as follows:

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a misapprehension as to the character of these so-called forest reserves. They are not forest reserves, although they bear that name. They were created at the instance of Western members of the House and Senate not as forests, but only to preserve by shade the snows which fall there from melting until midsummer, when the water is so much needed in the valleys below for irrigation of farm lands. They are located not in low places, but high up on the mountains.

Every gentleman in this House knows that timber will not grow in high altitudes. Very little but scrub timber grows there, and as you go higher you get to the line that is called the "timber line," where not a stick of timber grows. These reservations that the gentlemen talk about as forest reserves are not forest reserves in fact, and a forestry bureau is not needed to administer them with success. This bureau that is in the Agricultural Department is an excellent bureau of its kind, but has for its object the scientific work of forestry, the writing of learned essays upon tree planting and culture, and the practical application in experiments of such knowledge. Such experiments would be in planting and cultivatiug rare and valuable woods, such as walnut, maple, beech, oak, and other woods, and in transplanting and cultivating valuable foreign species of wood. Its principal work should be education of the entire people in tree culture and in encouraging the people to raise hard woods.

To talk about planting trees in these forest reserves when they are located from seven to ten thousand feet above sea level is absolutely absurd. Good or valuable timber to any appreciable extent will not grow there. As a matter of fact, there is another reason why forest trees will not grow there—it is because there is not sufficient rainfall. The pine, spruce, and quaking aspen are the only trees that I know of that will grow in the middle section of the Rocky Mountains. Consequently when you talk about putting into the hands of a bureau of scientific men, who have the scientific cultivation of forest trees in view, these lands that are really not forest reserves it is absurd. You might as well say that a learned professor of Greek, because he is in a university, should take care of the whole building.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. SCOTT. I understood the gentleman to say that these forest reserves were set apart in the beginning in order that trees might be preserved and the shade continued for the protection of the snow so that it might not melt until midsummer. A little later on I understood the gentleman to say there were no trees in these forest reserves——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; I did not say that; there are trees.

Mr. SCOTT. And that trees would not grow there?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; there are scrub trees there that grow, and also brush as you get higher in altitude. As you go up you will find the trees become dwarfed until you come to the timber line, and then beyond that you will find brush, and that brush is really more important than trees to preserve the snows.

Mr. SCOTT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the reserves are confined to the brush altitudes?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; they are not confined to the brush altitudes. There are some good trees on these reserves, but there is not a large quantity of good, merchantable timber there. They are up a little too high. Sometimes you see a good-sized tree there and sometimes you will find a little section of trees, but there is no valuable timber to speak of. In the forest reserve south of the Yellowstone Park, a report says only 2 per cent of the timber is merchantable I am speaking now of the character of the reserves in the middle section of the Rocky Mountains. What they are in Oregon I do not know. It may be that large trees grow in the high altitudes of Oregon, but I take it as a general rule that altitude will always dwarf a tree, whether in one part of the world or another; and it is universally conceded that these forest reserves which we are talking about are in high altitudes.

Mr. SCOTT. I understand that, but I understand it is not the purpose of this bill to protect these forests for lumbering purposes, but for the purpose of preserving and continuing the water supply. Now, it is just as necessary for such a purpose that the scraggly growth which is on the high mountains should be protected from fire as it is that the lower slopes should be preserved, and it is particularly desirable that all of these reserves should be protected from fire.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is true, and we have no objection to their protection from fire, but it does not take a bureau of scientists to do that.

Mr. SCOTT. But the Secretary of the Interior in his report says that he has been obliged to apply to the Forestry Division of Agriculture for experts to suggest the proper care of these reserves.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It may be as to a few reservations that forestry questions arise, but not as to the mass of them. These reserves were never created for forest reserves, and in the proper sense of the word they are not forest reserves. They were created simply for the purpose of preserving shade, so that snow would not melt until summer, and that when it does melt it will give abundant water for irrigation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I would like a few minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Now, Mr. Chairman, the idea of talking about forestry in Germany and forestry in France, and the necessity for it here, and that we are depleting our lands, has no connection with this question whatever. If the Government wants to undertake forestry here, it ought to acquire land near the sea level and reserve whatever timber lands the Government now owns in such an altitude, and then you can put the Forestry Bureau of the Agricultural Department in charge and accomplish great good. But to say that such a bureau should take the reserves located where no good timber can grow, where nothiug but pine, spruce, and quaking asp grow, because they do not require much water, is absurd.

It seems to me that scientific men, men who write books, have no business in taking care of these reservations where forestry can not possibly be made a success. These trees are on the mountain side; some of them grow out of rock where you can scarcely see any earth at all.

The calling of these tracts of land forest reserves is a mistake. They are not forest reserves; there may be a few reserves in the country—there may be some in the western slope—that contain some valuable timber. But as to those in the middle section of the United States, where I reside, it is absolutely a misnomer to call them forest reserves.

Now, in view of that fact, and in view of the fact that you can not have forestry conducted there, in view of the fact that the altitude is too high for the growing of good timber, in view of the fact that the topography of the ground is such that you can not cultivate trees for forestry purposes in any such reservation, and in view of the fact that there is not rainfall enough (even if the country were level) to raise trees, it is a mistake to put this work into the hands of a bureau that has studied the subject of forestry from the standpoint of German and French forests, and would no doubt do excellent service in a forest created on the Eastern coast or in the Mississippi Valley, but it is an absurdity to attempt to turn over to that kind of a bureau the care of these reserves which have been cared for by the Interior Department for ten years—a Department that has had experience for this length of time in handling the questions arising there, a Department which has been and is competent to take care of the subject.

Mr. NEEDHAM rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that this debate is now proceeding by unanimous consent. If there be no objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from California [Mr. NEEDHAM].

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Chairman, it may not be inappropriate to say a word as to just what this bill contemplates. One might suppose from the speech delivered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that this bill contemplates a radical departure in our forestry service.

Mr. Chairman, the bill simply authorizes the President, in his discretion, to transfer by proclamation certain forest reserves whose boundaries have been permanently marked to the Bureau of Forestry, in the Department of Agriculture, for administrative purposes. There is not a mandatory provision in the bill. It simply gives the President the authority which he asks in his message; that is, authority, if he sees fit and the public service should demand it, to transfer certain of these reserves to this Bureau of the Agricultural Department. There can be no valid objection whatever to such a policy. It is a step in the right direction—a step toward better forestry administration; and it seems to me that the bill ought to pass unanimously. I sincerely hope that it will.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to strike out the enacting clause.

The question having been taken,

The CHAIRMAN. The noes seem to have it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 37, noes 36.

Mr. LACEY. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CANNON and Mr. LACEY were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 47.

So the motion of Mr. CANNON was agreed to.

Mr. LACEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11536) to transfer certain forest reserves to the control of the Department of Agriculture, to authorize game and fish protection in forest reserves, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House concur in the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. LACEY. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 100, nays 73, answered "present" 19, not voting 159, as follows:

TELEGRAPHIC CABLES BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately on the adoption of this rule, and immediately after the reading of the Journal on each day thereafter until the bill hereinafter mentioned shall have been disposed of, the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of the bill (H. R. 5) to authorize the construction, operation, and maintenance of telegraphic cables between the United States of America and Hawaii, Guam, and the Philippine Islands, and other countries, and to promote commerce. And after due consideration in the Committee of the Whole, the same shall be reported to the House with amendments; thereupon, without debate or intervening motions, the question shall be taken on pending amendments, if there be any, on the engrossment and third reading, and on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. DALZELL, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the House numbered 199, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report the same with the recommendation that the following amendment be agreed to:

Strike out lines 10 to 15, inclusive, and insert "and after four hours of general debate in the Committee of the Whole the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule; and any proposition relating to ocean cables shall be considered germane thereto."

And that, as amended, the resolution be agreed to.

Mr. DALZELL and Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me just for a moment? I am informed that two of the leading opponents of this measure, who occupy seats on the side of the House on which my friend and committee colleague [Mr. DALZELL] sits are absent; and while I have not been authorized by those gentlemen, I have by friends who feel as they do, to ask the gentleman if he is not willing to postpone the consideration of this measure until they return? I only want to say that they are not absent in the interest of this side of the House, or of any interest that I hold very dear personally; but possibly the worst that can be said about them is that they are absent in the interest of their own party. I hope, however, that the gentleman will agree that the consideration of the bill may be postponed until they return.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I say to my friend from Tennessee that the majority members of the Committee on Rules have been in correspondence with the gentlemen to whom he refers, and that, taking into consideration the state of the public business in the House and the prospects of adjournment, it was not deemed wise or indeed reasonably possible to change the order of business as it had been arranged, and that therefore we thought it necessary to go on at this time with this business. The bill referred to in the rule is what is known as the Corliss bill——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I thought possibly we might be able to take up the irrigation bill first.

Mr. DALZELL. All I can say is that the gentleman was mistaken in that thought.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am very sorry I was mistaken. It was a very reasonable thought.

Mr. DALZELL. The bill referred to in the rule is what is known as the Corliss bill. The bill provides for the construction of a cable across the Pacific at the Government expense. There are pending in the House, however, and in the Senate, seven different bills upon this subject. I do not understand that there is any objection upon the part of anyone to a Pacific cable. The question really is whether it shall be built by the United States or whether it shall be built by private individuals. So long ago as February, 1899, Mr. McKinley sent a special message to Congress pointing out the absolute necessity for the construction of a cable, whether by private or by public enterprise, and I am told that the War Department of the United States during the past year incurred an expense on an average of about a thousand dollars a day for cable messages between Washington and Manila.

Now, the purpose of this rule is not to confine the House to the consideration of the Corliss bill, so that it may be voted up or voted down, but it is to give the House an opportunity to pass upon the question as to whether or not there shall be a Pacific cable, because under the rule any amendment that relates to the construction of a cable will be germane to this bill. The whole subject, therefore, will be open to consideration by the House, and to the discussion of the several theories that are entertained by the various members of the House. The proposition is that there shall be general debate for four hours and that after that the bill shall be open to amendment and discussion under the five-minute rule.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I believe it was agreed in the Committee on Rules that there should be one hour for debate on the rule. That was a part of our agreement, as I remember.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not recall any such agreement, but my colleague says that there was.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There was.

Mr. DALZELL. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I desire to yield to the gentlemen representing the minority of the committee that reported the bill the thirty minutes that will be allowed in opposition to the rule.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman desire to yield the time?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield the entire thirty minutes allowed to the minority of the Committee on Rules to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON], to be divided as they see fit.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, considering the character of the Federal Government, the purposes of its creation and the varied interests of our people, together with their worth, industry, and genius, it is not desirable to embark the Government as such in enterprises involving competition with private capital and individual labor.

If governmental necessities demanded the use of a cable across the Pacific and private capital failed to respond to the demand, it would be right for the Government to stretch forth its strong arm and provide what was needed. That view alone justified support of the canal bill. Some men yet stoutly maintain that private capital would have constructed the canal if the Government had not interfered. Some undertakings are so stupendous in their character, however, that only a mighty government can carry them through, and this House believed the canal enterprise to be one of them.

During three Congresses, and possibly longer, those who desired Government construction of a Pacific cable have contended against those who favored subsidizing a corporation. Many of us, fearing either alternative, looked and longed for private capital to undertake the risk and responsibility, with consequent profits, of securing for our Government proper rates, safeguards, and facilities, with efficient service and reasonable charges to our people.

A company meeting our most ardent wishes has now appeared and is actually engaged in construction, with contracts all made and arrangements perfected to communicate with Hawaii during the present year and extend the line thence to Manila within two years thereafter. That company also has satisfactory arrangements for connecting its Manila office with China and Japan.

At our end of the committee table there has been some division on the general question of Government construction and ownership, but that division has no application to desiring an arbitrary rule to force a hasty consideration of the subject under existing circumstances. In fact, in both the Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Congresses we filed unanimous minority reports opposing governmental interference either by subsidy or construction.

The Commercial Pacific Cable Company, with apparent sincerity and much plausibility, professing to afford the very opportunity which we have long sought, and realizing, as we do, that if we should authorize action now we could not actually begin work until long after that company had landed its wire at Hawaii, we deem it wise to postpone consideration until the short session next December. Then if we are not satisfied with the progress made by that company and the necessities of the Government should demand action, it would be time enough to embark in the enterprise.

Some of us, however, believe, in common with several of our most eminent colleagues at the other end of the table, that our long-sought opportunity has arrived; that a cable is in sight without expense or liability on the part of the Federal Government and prepared to accommodate the commerce of the country with better terms and facilities than a Government cable could do without loss to the Treasury. It would be difficult to find a more desirable situation. An American company with a domestic charter, home capital, and a large majority of American directors, proceeding actually to construct a cable from California via several American islands to Manila without once touching foreign territory.

Our Government is invited to prescribe its own rates for Government business. It is agreed that our Government may take possession of the cable, together with its offices and appurtenances, whenever desirable, or that our Government may buy the cable at its true value at any time. But we are not compelled to do so. When we determine that we need a cable, we can proceed at any time to construct one, paralleling that one, or choosing a route to suit ourselves.

It is also proposed that our commerce shall have a guaranteed rate not exceeding $1 to Manila, China, and Japan, with proportionately lower rates to intermediate points. Expert witnesses, favoring this bill now, stated in the hearings before our committee that the Government could not afford a lower rate than that if it constructed the cable. The most objectionable feature, if not really the only one, of the Commercial Pacific Cable Company's enterprise is that it has contracted for an English-made cable, but Admiral Bradford supported the company's contention that it was necessary in order to secure dispatch, quality, and efficiency.

Admiral Bradford also enlarged on the wise suggestion that the Government could not afford to invest in a plant and cable ship, together with all the enormous outlays necessary to prepare for constructing that cable alone, even if it were certain that we could, without delay, produce a good cable. He thought our Government could not afford to equip itself for this work unless we intended to continue in the cable business and in future construct and maintain cables for the balance of the world. He was clear in his mind that neither our Government nor our people could possibly do the work without great delay and expensive preparation.

In so great an undertaking he was positive we could not afford to indulge in experiments, wisely emphasizing the statement that in so important a work the very best thing we could find in the world would be the cheapest, no matter what it cost. It is unavailing now, however, to discuss the question of domestic as against foreign material, because the contracts have already been made, the work is in progress, and the cable will be finished to Hawaii before Congress reassembles in December, even if we should now authorize the Government to enter the business.

It can not with any show of reason or truth be denied that private capital is ready to proceed with the work. Neither can it be said that our Government stands in such great and urgent need of the cable as to justify precipitate action. The maximum amount ever expended by the Government for cable messages in one year in connection with our Eastern complications did not exceed $400,000—at the old rate of nearly $2.50 per word. That price has already been reduced nearly one-half. When the Commercial Pacific Cable Company completes its line the rate to the public will be $1.

If the Government paid that rate, the greatest volume of business it has ever had would not exceed $166,000, which the Government can still further reduce at its own option if it concludes that a dollar a word is too high a rate. But a saving of $166,000, or even of $400,000, would be a small annual return on an investment of $15,000,000, besides the plant, preparation, management, and maintenance.

The representatives from the War and Navy Departments who appeared before our committee expressed the opinion that the Government business is decreasing and that its volume will perhaps be never again so large as in the past. They also frankly admitted that the main demand for the cable was in the interest of commerce. General Greely so stated at two different hearings.

I submit that the Federal Government ought not to go into business solely in the interest of citizens engaged in trade. Commerce ought to bear its own burdens, and in this case private capital stands ready to assume and carry the burden, and is in reality urging and beseeching the Government to confine itself to its own proper functions and abstain from unnecessary competition with legitimate private business.

It is seriously demanded on the part of zealous paternalists to interfere, not because of any doubt that a cable will be promptly built by private capital, but solely through apprehension that it will be done. Sordid greed unblushingly demands that the Government exert its power to drive out and destroy private enterprise from a field legitimately occupied for the good of our Government and people as well as the profit of the company so engaged.

In order to arouse passion and prejudice the minds of statesmen much reckless statement has been indulged and many vile epithets applied to the gentlemen prosecuting this enterprise by the people who are urging the Government to adopt a tyrannical and unjustified course of wrong and oppression at the instigation of nothing better than selfishness.

All the vituperation and slander gratuitously heaped upon the enterprising gentlemen serving our commerce, our people, and our Government by constructing that cable, and all the wild flights of disordered imagination about monopoly gorgons, horrors. and dragons are strikingly discounted by the fact that the same prominent persons who now demand the passage of this bill have heretofore just as earnestly opposed government ownership, and repeatedly besought us to subsidize their company, admitting frankly that their positions varied with their shifting interests, and that they now desire the Government to construct for their benefit without cost a connection too expensive for them to build, but which the other company now at work is willing to build for its own use and pay for it.

It is remarkable how some people hate monopoly when they are not doing the monopolizing; but there is nothing cooler among the icebergs of the North Pole than the imperturbable frigidity of the avaricious but shifty adventurers who opposed Government construction when they wanted a contract to build, but who now demand that the Government interpose and enable them to compete with the Pacific Commercial Cable Company.

One gentlemen gravely suggested that the Government could use money at a lower rate of interest than private individuals. And it was urged that the Government could extinguish concessions at Manila for about $400,000, which would enable the parties inviting our Government action to revive and use a claim they hold of a so-called concession to build a line to China. They pretend that they can not extinguish the concessions which bar them out of Manila. They make no offer to reimburse our Government the demanded outlay of $400,000 for their benefit, nor has any protest been heard from their outraged consciences at their prospect of a monopoly through the grace and bounty of our Government.

As to the attempted arguments about exclusive concessions and closing up the Pacific Ocean by the unyielding clutches of grasping and exclusive privileges, there need be no harrowing fear allowed to disturb the serenity of any patriotic breast as to the ability of this Government to find a way to accomplish its purposes and enforce its desires whenever it is adjudged necessary to construct a cable in the Pacific Ocean.

But it is not right to drive out private capital, either by brute force or unnecessary competition, and the patriot who so contends is a better friend to his Government and people than the unthinking enthusiast who would load down the Government with matters foreign to its function or invoke its power to crush out the capital, labor, and genius of our people.

The construction of Government cables is not popular, even among autocrats, but, with enlightened economic views, private effort is preferred, welcomed, and encouraged.

They will even grant large subsidies where necessary to avoid governmental responsibility, and resort to the public Treasury only when recourse to all other means fails of accomplishing a necessary public purpose.

The hearings before our committee were enlivened by one great compensating consideration, inasmuch as they disclosed one American manufacturer, Mr. Henry, who, while confidently professing ability to produce a cable equal to the best, thought he could do so for about 10 per cent less price than charged by foreign manufacturers.

The discovery of that establishment giving promise of a glad day when our American manufacturers will sell to us—their neighbors—as cheaply as to strangers in distant lands, and making rare manifestation of that patriotism which will work more cheaply for our Government and people rather than always holding us up for a bonus, ought to bring joy to the hearts of all good men, regardless of the fate of this bill. That discovery, however, ought to drive from its support all those who favor it solely for the purpose and hope of establishing an American plant and using American material [Loud applause.]

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Assuming that the gentleman had half of the thirty minutes, he has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama such time as he wishes.

The SPEAKER. That gives the gentleman from Alabama the twenty-three minutes remaining.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I fully realize the great difficulty and absolute uncertainty that attends every effort of this kind to defeat a rule that has been recommended by the Committee on Rules. I have never had any occasion, Mr. Speaker, to make any complaints since I have had the honor of holding a seat on this floor about any rule of the House. I have been impressed with the belief that an arbitrary rule in this House, in most instances, is absolutely necessary to secure the proper consideration of important subjects and necessary legislation.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Alabama kindly yields to me, Mr. Speaker. I forgot to state in the proper connection—and a friend on the other side called my attention to it—the proposition of the Commercial Pacific Company is that the Government may seize and use that cable, with all its officers, equipment, appurtenances, if it deems it necessary, and pay only for the use of it, and at any time in the future the Government desires it may purchase that cable and pay for it at its real appraised value.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KLEBERG. Is it not a fact that this very company has already gone to some expense and is prepared to lay the cable? The company, according to the testimony, has made not only some progress, but is actually at work and expects to complete the cable to Honolulu by November, and they say they will complete the cable whether this Government competes with it or not in a rival line.

Mr. WANGER. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. WANGER. Will you kindly state for our information how this offer of the Commercial Pacific Company is made; is it simply a part of the current literature or is it in the form of a valid, binding contract which can be enforced?

Mr. ADAMSON. I am much flattered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in intimating that I am capable of giving him information, and I would gladly answer him, but my friend from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] just said sotto voce that he was proceeding to that subject, and I will allow him to answer the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I was just proceeding to say, when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Georgia, that my impression had been that in the policy that governed the Committee on Rules there were two classes of subjects or questions upon which the committee would act. One was a political question that might be considered of special benefit to the party in the majority. I can understand how a rule can be favored by the Republican members of the present Rules Committee to advance the political interests of the political party in power. The next consideration is where there is a great emergency, and the rule is asked for the public good and where the public good will be advanced by the consideration of the subject.

Now, this question that we are considering—and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] stated it in very concise and accurate terms—is not a political question, because the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, is divided upon it, both Republicans and Democrats favoring each the majority and minority reports of the committee. It is not a political question, and neither one of the great political parties in this country would undertake for a moment in a national platform to advocate government ownership of utilities. Neither one, I dare say, would do it. It is not one of those questions of such emergency as can be called for the public good, or of advancing it any way.

Now, in past Congresses I understand the question has been presented in two classes, one for a subsidy of three hundred and fifty or four hundred thousand dollars to a private company to build this cable, the other a simple, plain proposition of governmental ownership. Now, it was not believed, as far as I can read and understand from the history of the past, that, if the question of private ownership made its appearance at any time in the coming future, that there would be any opposition to it. I can understand and readily appreciate how reluctant the American Congress would be to enter into a policy of granting to cables a subsidy. Then the whole question is, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], whether we shall favor private ownership or whether we shall favor governmental ownership.

Now, in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER], who asked the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] the question as to the character of the contract, the facts are simply these: The Commercial Pacific Cable Company has already entered into a contract, and that contract embraces every one of the provision which are included in what is known as the post-road act of 1866. I know the suggestion is, and has been heretofore made on the floor of this House, that the post-road act of 1866 does not apply in this case because it relates to land telegraphs, and so on; but this company has embraced and has filed its bond under the advice and instruction of its board of directors, by which it contracts and obligates itself to do this: First, let Government messages go at half rates; to do this without any subsidy or aid; to reduce the cost of messages as they exist to-day from $1.66 from San Francisco to Manila to $1 per word, and also making $1 per word the rate from the coast of California to Hongkong. They propose to reduce it from $1.66 a word to $1.

Now, the next guaranty it makes is that it agrees to let all the Government messages go at half rates. But the important one is that it allows and agrees that the Postmaster-General shall prescribe the rates of this company. It further guarantees and agrees that at any time the Government sees proper it shall take over the property of this private company at its appraised value, two of the appraisers to be appointed by the company and two to be appointed by the Government, and these four to select the fifth man.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the ordinary plain business proposition is that here is a company that has entered into an obligation and contract, and there are men on the floor who know the reputation and standing and character of John W. Mackay, of California, better than I do. They say his word is as good as his bond, and he has obligated his company to do these things. Here is a private company that has entered into a contract. It is a plain business proposition. They have entered into a contract to complete this line from the coast of California to Honolulu, something over 2,000 miles, upon the 1st day of January of next year.

They have already paid $500,000 on that contract, and they have obligated themselves to pay two million and a half more upon it when completed to Honolulu. The undisputed testimony in this case, as given before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, was, without any question and without contradiction whatsoever, to the effect, as gentlemen will remember, that the line from California to Honolulu would not pay running expenses. Then the question naturally arises, Why is it that this company is willing to expend two million and a half of dollars on 2,000 miles of this cable, when it will not pay running expenses to that point? Why, sir, the sole answer is that they are going to build the cable to Manila by January, 1905, as their contract obligates them to do, and then it will become a paying line.

Now, these are the plain facts, and there is no escape from them. If there is a failure on the part of that company on account of difficulties of working, the breakings, etc., so as to entail great expense, why should not the Government let this private commercial company incur the risk and expense. After they have completed the line, should the Government find urgent necessity, by reason of war or any other great exigency, then let the Government buy the line, paying the appraised value for it. That is the business proposition that is made to this House to-day.

Mr. Speaker, I think I appreciate the conditions that might arise in a case of this kind, when it might become necessary for the Government to construct, own, and operate a cable line. If the interests involved were such that the public safety was at stake, that the success of our Army was concerned—if any of these contingencies should occur which have been referred to in connection with this matter—then the Government might be justified in building this cable. This company also agrees that whenever the Secretary of State sees that the interests of this Government render it necessary, he can step in and not only take the property at its appraised value, but if he does not want to do that, he can put operatives in there, men whom the Government can trust, and run the line in the interest of the Government and pay simply an ordinary, fair rental. Mr. Speaker, that is the proposition as my colleague from Georgia has stated.

Mr. Speaker, this is an important matter. It is a serious precedent that we are invited to establish. This will be the first cable that our Government has been invited to consider the feasibility of constructing, owning, and operating. It is a serious matter to inaugurate Government ownership of a project of this kind, in conflict with private enterprise. If private companies can build these lines, why not let them go on and do it? I say, as a business proposition, why should we want to increase and multiply Government officers? Why should we do it? Certainly, as an economical proposition, there is but one practical view. No man can stand on this floor and say that the passage of this bill is demanded by any special interest of ours or by any military necessity in the Philippine Islands.

I would support this bill without hesitancy if the interests of this Government as a war measure demanded it or if the welfare of our soldiers in the Philippines required it. But nothing of that kind exists. The whole country is at peace, the whole country is looking forward to advanced and increased prosperity. If there be (as in truth there is) a rivalry between different telegraph companies in regard to this project, let them fight it out. It is competition that gives cheaper rates to the people.

Do you know what the figures and the facts are in regard to those that will use this Pacific cable? The estimate is that there are about 400 people who will patronize this cable company; that 300 of these are foreigners and 100 Americans. And you are asked to expend for the Government from fifteen to twenty million dollars on this Pacific cable, to accommodate 300 foreigners and 100 Americans! Those are the facts taken from the telegraphic record. Is there, then, any reason, any propriety, any justice in the Government entering upon such an unreasonable enterprise?

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill has been under consideration in the Senate, and I desire to read a telegraphic dispatch on this subject sent from this city to the Baltimore Sun:

Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS, of California, who introduced in the Senate a Pacific cable bill similar to that for which the House Committee on Rules has reported a special order in the House, is now opposed to the measure, on the ground that the cable can better be constructed by private enterprise.

Speaking on the subject to-day he said:

"It is in no wise probable that the Government at this time wishes unnecessarily to invest $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 in a Pacific cable. If the Government should either now or hereafter desire to own a cable across the Pacific, the only reasonable thing for it to do is to let the Commercial Cable Company build a cable and then buy it from that company.

"This would save a great deal of trouble, expense, and time.

"It seems to me that the only question is whether the private company means to carry out the enterprise and is able to do so. On this no one who knows the company in this case will doubt. The Commercial Pacific Cable Company is an outgrowth of the well-known Commercial Cable Company, of which John W. Mackay is president and chief stockholder. Mr. Mackay's character and business integrity are beyond question."

With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, on the consideration of the rule, I defer anything else I have to say until later.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I would inquire how much time is left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes remaining, but has yielded the floor.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Twenty-six minutes remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD].

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have heretofore been opposed to taking up this bill for consideration lest its passage should be construed as in some way committing us to the permanent retention of the Philippine Islands, to which I am unalterably opposed. On reflection, I am not able to find anything in the bill warranting such a construction. I am, therefore, in favor of the present consideration of the bill. I favor government construction and maintenance of all needed oceanic cables, but I shall not discuss the merits of the bill till it comes up for consideration.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] did not reserve his remaining time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama yielded the floor without reserving his time.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I should like leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to my colleague [Mr. GROSVENOR] five minutes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, an inspection of this rule as amended by the Committee on Rules and reported to the House will show that the Committee on Rules have no anxiety about the manner in which the ultimate question of a Pacific cable shall be disposed of, for they have left the door open for the fullest and widest amendment to the Corliss bill; even for the substitution of any other scheme of ocean cable.

It is said that some gentlemen are absent from the House and that fact is commented upon for some reason; I hardly know what. I desire to defend the Committee on Rules, if there is any necessity for it, from any possible suspicion that they have any ulterior or sinister design in bringing this question before the House at this time in the absence of those two gentlemen.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me—

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I desire for myself to disclaim any intention of making such a reflection on the committee. The extent of my appeal was simply this, that as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] had studied this question so extensively, and as they desired the very opportunity that your rule would give them to perfect this bill, I desired to have the consideration of the matter postponed until they could get back.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not think the gentleman, or any other gentleman, intended to reflect upon the committee; but I desire to supplement what I have already said by saying that this question has been pressed upon the Committee on Rules for the last two months, I think I may say. It seems to me as though it had been a year and a half of unceasing pressure brought to bear to have this question brought before the House and finally disposed of.

I think the committee would have been derelict in their duty if they had jeopardized a decision of the question, first, whether we are to have a cable, and second, what sort of a cable we are to have, and had let Congress adjourn without having opportunity to decide so important and indispensable a matter as that. Now, the time has come at last when we must take up business and dispose of it, and let me call the attention of the House to a list of important matters already practically agreed upon as necessary to be considered. This is only a partial list at that. We have pending the appropriation bills. I admit that they are well out of the way and not likely to occupy the time of the House very long.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman state who agreed to this list?

Mr. GROSVENOR. This is not an agreed list at all—not in the sense implied by the remark of the gentleman. It is a memorandum that I have made for my own use, to suggest the important questions that members are all familiar with.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understood the gentleman to say that these were subjects which it had been agreed must be considered.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, not at all. There has been no agreement that I know of. Then comes the Pacific cable. Then comes irrigation, and if the question of irrigation is to be heard, and if it is to have the length of time requested by its friends, and that seems to be commensurate with the high importance of the subject, then surely we can not afford to trifle with the time which would prevent the coming up of that bill immediately and the postponement of it possibly indefinitely, beyond the recurrence of the greater question which I propose to suggest.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to consume the gentleman's time——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, yes; my time is not important.

Mr. ADAMSON. I should like to ask the gentleman if anything would be lost by taking up the irrigation bill now in substitution for this and letting this follow when the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] return?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is a question for the House to decide.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what I wish to say.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then we have a series of general pension bills. We have a most important militia bill unanimously reported from the committee, I believe. Then we have the question of the seal fisheries, which is a very interesting question and one that must be disposed of at this session if there is to be any value in our action. The Hawaiian silver question, an election case, a bankruptcy question that is bringing telegrams from all parts of the United States pouring in upon members of the Committee on Rules; and then the Philippine bill, and then questions growing out of pensions to Indian war veterans. That is only a small portion of the bills that are clamoring for action, and now something has to be done, and this bill had been agreed upon for more than two weeks, and has been pushed out of the way three or four times.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield more time to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This bill has been pushed out of the way several times, and the gentlemen who are now, unfortunately, absent had full notice of the fact. Mr. HEPBURN, as I understood, would be back here to-day. It was distinctly understood that Mr. SHERMAN would be here to-day, but I am told that his friends have heard that it was impossible, on account of some conditions, either of business or of his health, or something of that character.

Nobody regrets the absence from any great national debate of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] or the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] more than I do. But we had to have some kind of orderly disposition of business, and here it is; and it is for the House to decide, and the Committee on Rules have no personal interest or feeling in the matter.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances I have always refrained from an expression of any opinion in the first instance as to the merits of a proposition involved in a rule reported by the Committee on Rules. I feel, however, under the circumstances of this occasion, that I ought perhaps to depart from that rule, in view of the insistence of gentlemen upon the other side upon the postponement of this measure until the return of the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from New York.

As I said at the opening, as long ago as February, 1899, President McKinley sent to this House a special message insisting upon the importance of the construction of a Pacific cable. From that day until this it has been one of the subjects of almost every Presidential message sent to this House, and it is now a proposition upon which the Administration is insisting in the interest of economy, insisting, not on any particular proposition, but on the construction of a Pacific cable that will enable the United States to carry on reasonable correspondence between its seat of government and its insular possessions. Hence it was thought by the Committee on Rules that it was not proper, whatever might be the individual views of its members as to the merits of this proposition or that proposition, to deny to the House an opportunity to consider the subject.

Having determined upon its consideration, to-day was determined upon as the proper time for the consideration of this measure. The gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from New York were both aware that this measure was to come up to-day, and I can say to the gentleman from Georgia that while I regret, with him, the absence of those two gentlemen, I can assure him that I regret it for the reason that I am on the same side of the proposition that they would be on if here.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman permit me one suggestion?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman will remember that as long ago as something like a week since it was hoped that this bill would be reached, and the matter that was before it not having been disposed of, carried the thing beyond the time and complicated things.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman knows that however desirous we may be to accommodate each other, it is absolutely impossible to arrange business to the convenience of individual members.

Mr. ADAMSON. Of course; but you must substitute one bill for another.

Mr. DALZELL. I want to say a word upon the merits of the proposition, and my attitude toward it. There are substantially two propositions. First, that the United States shall build and operate a cable. That is the proposition which is involved in the Corliss bill. I am opposed to that proposition. I do not believe in government ownership and management of any business that can be as well owned and managed by private enterprise. The history of government ownership of railroads and telegraph abroad as compared with ownership and management by private enterprise on this side of the water is all in favor of leaving such matters to private enterprise.

I am opposed to the Corliss bill; I am opposed to the United States expending $15,000,000 to land a cable in Manila, and one million and a half a year for the purpose of its maintenance, without any hope of an adequate return. I am in favor of the construction of a private cable. The gentlemen on the other side of the House, who have spoken, are advocating here the building of a private cable, which has already been begun by Mr. John Mackay, and they say that he has entered into a contract for the construc- of that cable, that the capital that is invested is American capital, that Mr. Mackay is an American, and all that sort of thing.

Now, my information is—whether it be true or not makes very little difference—my information is that the capital invested in this Mackay company is English capital; and while Mr. Mackay no doubt is really an American, it is a great many years since he has lived among his own countrymen, and it is a great many years since Mr. Bennett has lived in his own country, and I put them into the category of expatriated Americans.

Now, the difference between Mackay's cable and the cable I would build is this: His cable will be made in English workshops, by English workmen, and the money paid to English wage-earners. The cable I would build would be made in American workshops, and the money paid to make it would be paid to American workmen, paid American wage rates. [Loud applause.] Mr. Mackay's cable will be laid by ships that will sail under the British flag, while the cable that I would build would be laid by vessels carrying the American flag, sailed by American sailors, and all the benefits inuring from the expenditure of $15,000,000 would inure to American citizens.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Nevada, who first sought recognition?

Mr. DALZELL. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The gentleman referred to Mr. Mackay as an expatriated American. I am sure the gentleman is not familiar with Mr. Mackay's career.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, well, if the gentleman says that is not so, I take it all back.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania probably derives his impression from the fact that Mr. Mackay's family has lived abroad a good deal, but Mr. Mackay is hardly ever abroad, and when he goes, is only there for a short time.

Mr. DALZELL. Very well, I will take it all back, but my proposition is to have the cable made by American workmen in American workshops rather than in British workshops, and that the company that lays it shall pay American workmen in American money, and not pay British workmen.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that the majority of the capital stock in this company belonged to Englishmen. Will the gentleman allow me to read the list of stockholders?

Mr. DALZELL. No, I did not say so. I said I had been so informed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I want to give you information to the contrary, and I will read the names of the stockholders, a list of which I have. It is as follows:

	Shares.
John W. Mackay	5,074
The Commercial Cable Company	2,522
George G. Ward	10
Clarence H. Mackay	10
Edward C. Platt	10
Arthur Beck	10
William W. Cook	10
George Clapperton	10

Of that list only three are Englishmen.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; as far as I am concerned.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Did not the testimony before the committee show that John W. Mackay held that stock not for himself, but in a fiduciary capacity for the Eastern Cable Company?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not recollect it that way.

Mr. DALZELL. Where does Mr. Mackay propose to construct his cable? Where is it going to be made?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. In England.

Mr. DALZELL. Very well; let us dismiss everything else.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. At the proper time I will show the reason why he has it made in England.

Mr. DALZELL. Let us dismiss everything but that. That is the reason I shall oppose your proposition. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a singular thing that no authority seems to exist under the present law either to authorize or to prevent the construction of a cable connecting the United States with foreign territory. And if there was no other legislation proposed we ought to write upon the statute book a law which would prohibit any company, either American or foreign, from connecting the territory of the United States either with its own territory or with any other territory except by due process of law.

There has been introduced in the Senate of the United States a bill which I understand was drawn by the Attorney-General of the United States and which at the proper time I propose to offer, if this matter shall be considered as a substitute for the Corliss bill—a bill which in its first section authorizes the President to make a contract for the construction of a cable in any way that to him may seem best; provided, however, that that contract shall contain certain terms, and which in its second section provides that no company or persons, except as duly authorized, shall be suffered to lay a cable. I shall add as a section thereto a provision calling for a cable of American manufacture to be laid under the American flag.

I say, whatever may be our individual views as to these various theories as to legislation, this is a subject we ought to discuss. If this House is against a Government cable, let us vote it down. If it is against a private cable, let us vote it down; but if under the operation of this rule it is possible to pass a bill to build a cable by an American company that shall result for the benefit of the American workmen and the American people, then this rule ought to prevail, so that we may have an opportunity to pass such legislation. I now ask for the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ADAMSON) there were 76 ayes and 56 noes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, there were—yeas 108, nays 73, answering "present" 14, not voting, 156, as follows:

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. MCLAIN obtained leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

TELEGRAPHIC CABLES BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. CORLISS. Before the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the time allowed for general debate under the rule be equally divided between the gentleman making the minority report [Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama] and myself.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] to modify his request, so that the time on this side shall be under the control of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], as he is my senior on the committee.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope that the gentleman from Alabama, regardless of seniority, will control the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] will state his request.

Mr. CORLISS. I ask that the time allotted for general debate in Committee of the Whole on this question be equally divided, and that one half of it be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and the other half by myself.

The question being put on the request of Mr. CORLISS, there was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the rule, the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill named therein, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. LACEY, will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report by its title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5) to authorize the construction, operation, and maintenance of telegraphic cables between the United States of America and Hawaii, Guam, and the Philippine Islands, and other countries, and to promote commerce.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, we have patiently labored for this hour, and I will endeavor not to weary the patience of the members, but I will ask those who desire to consider this subject carefully for the best interests of our people and our country to kindly give me their ears and then judge as to their course. The proposition pending is for the construction of a Government cable extending from California to Hawaii, thence to the Midway Islands, thence to Guam and the Philippine Islands, with power in the President to connect the lines with those existing or hereafter to be constructed in the Orient. It is to be an all-American cable, laid only upon American soil, made by American cable manufacturers, laid by American citizens, and, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] said, under the Stars and Stripes.

I appreciate the fact that a great majority of candid men when first confronted with this proposition will say, as I did, "I am not in favor of the Government assuming control of public utilities; I am opposed to the Government ownership of railroads and telegraph lines. I am not in favor of paternalism." Yet, gentlemen, the time has come when, in order to preserve the rights of our people and to break a monopoly which has even threatened the power of Great Britain, you and I must face this question and decide whether we will preserve for the people the right which was given to them when the Post-Office Department was established, namely, communication with their own possessions, communication with the world, and especially with the Orient, at a rate which will enable us to go onward and not backward in our career.

As stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, there is no law upon the statute books, no precedent in existence, by which or through which the President of the United States can regulate this cable company. He is powerless to act. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken in one respect. He has authority under the recognition of the act of President Grant to prohibit a foreign company from landing upon American soil, but where he is mistaken is in this: The President of the United States, and the Attorney-General has so advised him, has no authority to interfere where that cable extends from our own to our own possessions.

I do not concur in that legal conclusion. This is a public utility. This is a franchise that belongs to the people, and no one, says Judge Macomb, of the United States court in New York, has authority to lay a cable without permission of our Government. So, my friends on this side of the House, you must either act yourselves or you must turn it over, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, to the President to determine. One or the other you must do. I can not shift the responsibility of this great question from my shoulders, where it belongs, to the Executive of this nation.

I am not willing that Congress shall deny or refuse to act, nor to extend to the President power to act where it fears or hesitates to act. One word with reference to the subject of the route. It has been laid out by our Government at our expense, by authority of Congress. Surveys have been made at an expense of $200,000, and Admiral Bradford, of the Navy, has testified that it is feasible; that the route has been laid properly; that the cable can be laid without difficulty and maintained. That survey has been completed at an expense to the Government of the United States of $200,000.

No private company can lay this cable without either the evidence in the Navy Department, to enable them to do so, or without resurveying the ground. Are you willing to give any such company the benefit of $200,000 of the public money? I am not. I have named the route which has been laid out by Admiral Bradford. Upon one of those islands we have already expended $500,000 for the erection of coaling stations and naval stations for the protection of our military power in the Pacific Ocean. That is on the island of Guam. What about the cost of this?

I do not ask you to take my word. I am not an expert, but we have the testimony of experts. The testimony of General Greely, Chief of the Signal Department, is to the effect that this cable can be made and laid, including two cable ships, for $10,000,000. That is concurred in by Admiral Bradford. That is supported by the testimony of Captain Squier, to whom I will refer later on, and who, by permission of the War Department, has written a letter upon this subject which I hope every man who is interested in this matter will carefully read.

By this it will be seen that this cable can be made and laid, including two cable ships, from California to Hawaii and Manila for less than $10,000,000. Secondly, we have the proposition of the cable people of this country, who have erected two cable plants in New Jersey. They have supplied our Government with about 2,000 miles of cable. They have expended a very large sum of money, too, in building up this industry; but they find that the foreign cable plants are able to get all of the large contracts of the world, and they are not able to get even the contracts from California to Hawaii for a cable laid, really, within American waters.

Mr. Henry, the engineer and manager of one of the large cable plants of this country, testified before the committee that his company stood ready to construct this cable, and would undertake to do it, within as brief a period as it can be furnished by any foreign company, and they will guarantee that it will be equal to the best cable in the world. As I am upon this subject I want to read Mr. Henry's letter which I have here, bearing date June 7, 1902. I do this because some one will say that we can not make cables in this country.

NEW YORK, June 6, 1902.

HON. JOHN B. CORLISS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We beg to call your attention to the various statements that have been made in publications and before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, that it was impossible to manufacture the Pacific cable in America.

We beg to state that this company stands ready at any time to take a contract for making and laying the trans-Pacific cable, guaranteeing it to be fully equal, if not superior, to any made in the world, and is willing to give bonds to this effect.

Respectfully, yours,

THE SAFETY INSULATED WIRE AND CABLE CO.,
IRA W. HENRY, Vice-President.

Mr. HOPKINS. Where is that establishment located?

Mr. CORLISS. On the New Jersey coast.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Whereabouts in New Jersey?

Mr. CORLISS. It is in Mr. GARDNER'S district, near Amboy.

Mr. DALZELL. How many cable manufacturing companies are there?

Mr. CORLISS. We have four small ones—that is, small compared with this one and the one located in the district of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. HOPKINS. Six companies in all?

Mr. CORLISS. There are six companies in all, but really only two at the present time capable of producing the real submarine cable. There has been no opportunity to develop this industry in this country, and I say to you, gentlemen, if something is not done that will give the Government of the United States authority to lay this cable, we will have no cable plant on the Pacific coast. I will reach that subject a little later.

As I said before, the great question for you and me to determine is, first, the proposition of government ownership; second, the proposition of Mr. Mackay's company; third, the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], to turn the matter over to the President.

Now, I will defer for a moment the consideration of the Government's interest. In England the military influence of a cable is regarded as equal to one-third of the entire power of the navy. I want to call your attention to what other governments have already done within five years. Great Britain endeavored for eight years to break down the monopoly that exists in the Orient. Finally, last May, the British Government concluded to lay a cable on its own account, extending from Vancouver down through the Pacific Ocean, connecting her possessions in the Pacific.

I will print in the RECORD the decrees and concessions relating to the islands of the Pacific. Great Britain, after eight years, concluded to break down the monopoly possessed by an English corporation, the Eastern Cable Extension Company—a corporation that for years has monopolized all this territory. When England found that she was powerless to direct the affairs of this cable company in time of war, she appointed a committee and finally, after years of discussion and investigation, ordered this cable laid from Vancouver, by way of the Fiji and Fanning islands, to New Zealand and Australia.

That was the first break in the monopoly of the corporation to which I refer. That was the cause of the cutting down of the rate to our Government from $2.25 per word to $1.66 per word. It was not done by Mr. Mackay or his influence. Great Britain is a Government that looks into the future. She sets her stakes a hundred years in advance, and her statesmen never falter in their onward march, in their tenacity and courage, looking toward her mastery of the sea. The only menace to Great Britain at the present time for the supremacy of the sea is the United States.

We must follow her example or surrender the possibilities of the future. Great Britain has adopted submarine cable as a part of her military power. She paid $60,000,000 in one lump to buy cables that were owned by private companies. She operates to-day 20,000 miles of submarine cables beside the one that she is building through the Pacific. I have that on authority of General Greely, who certified to the facts.

It may be said that the Government of Great Britain did not own but 2,000 miles of cable, before she commenced building the Pacific cable. She bought the stock of the corporations that held the cables, and holds it as she does the stock of the Suez Canal. She allowed France to build the canal, but she immediately bought the stock, and to-day controls it, just as though she had built it. And she has done the same with reference to cables.

Now, then, let me proceed to the next proposition. What does the Eastern Extension Cable Company have? First, a grant from China, which extends until 1930, which gives to her the absolute and the exclusive right to lay and operate cables and telegraph lines in China. That grant is absolute and exclusive, and has been recognized by Great Britain by an act of Parliament so far as Hongkong is concerned; and no company, corporation, or individual can enter China in any way except through and over the lines of the Eastern Extension Cable Company.

Her allied corporation, the Danish company, owns control in Japan until 1910, under a grant which is exclusive, that will not allow any other company, corporation, or government to enter Japan until after that grant expires. That company is also controlled by the Eastern Extension Cable Company. In March, 1898, about two months before the Spanish war broke out, the Eastern Extension Cable Company obtained from Spain an exclusive right covering all her Pacific possessions. Of that grant allow me to read just one or two words in order that you may understand the purport thereof. The concession of an extension of twenty years, which will expire May 8, 1940. Mind you, they had an exclusive grant, granted in 1897; but this was an extension of it:

Firstly, the concession of an extension for twenty years, which will expire May 8, 1940, in the monopoly enjoyed by the aforesaid company for the working of the Hongkong and Manila cable, until which date no other submarine telegraph cable line can be laid between the points mentioned.

That is the line covering Manila and Kongkong.

Secondly, the extension of the landing privilege, for a period of twenty years, of the cables the concession for which may be granted for the purpose of joining all the Spanish possessions in the Pacific Ocean and of connecting them with other countries, such period to be reckoned from the date on which said new cables are opened for working.

Under that decree, which was certified to me by the War Department as correct, it gives to the Eastern Extension Cable Company exclusive right to land cables in the Philippine Islands and to land them at Guam and the Marshall Islands and the Pelew Islands. We had not possession of them then. We got them under the treaty of Paris. That treaty provides that we shall recognize existing contracts. Germany acquired the Marshall Islands after we acquired the Philippines and Guam, under similar conditions. These exclusive grants held by this company run from ten to thirty-eight years.

Now, what can we do about it? Absolutely nothing, except by the power of the Government of the United States. Under these conditions, fortunately, the right of the Government to lay its own cables was reserved. I will put those provisions in the RECORD, so that you may read them correctly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CORLISS. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Has that question which you have just discussed ever been presented to the Attorney-General for his opinion as to the legality of those contracts?

Mr. CORLISS. I was about to reach that question. It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States in an identically similar case with reference to a land grant in California when we annexed that territory. It has also been held by the Supreme Court of the United States in a ferryboat case under a grant which was held to be perpetual. It has been held in another case that I can refer to, that these exclusive grants made by foreign governments before we acquired the territory were binding upon our Government.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CORLISS. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Referring to the somewhat similar case of the banks of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, whether they possessed the right to issue notes, does the gentleman claim that the Government of the United States has not the power to tax those notes out of existence, just as it did in the case of the State banks?

Mr. HAMILTON. That is assuming the sovereignty; a cable is a different matter.

Mr. CORLISS. Gentlemen must permit me to go on.

Mr. HOPKINS. The point that I am putting to the gentleman is whether these contracts are binding upon the Government of the United States, in the opinion of the Attorney-General.

Mr. HILL. I think they can be controlled by the taxing power, the same as the State banks were.

Mr. CORLISS. If gentlemen will kindly permit me, I will be able to give you the information that I have acquired after years of labor, and I hope it will be of benefit to our country.

I read from the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, Mr. Griggs, written only a few years ago upon an identically similar question, and John W. Mackay was then in the position that I am now. John W. Mackay wanted to get into Cuba. John W. Mackay was trying to break down the monopoly that was held by the other cable company, and he appealed to our Government and asked our Government to give him authority to build a competing line, and our Government considered the matter and the Attorney-General wrote an opinion upon it, holding that the exclusive rights granted by Spain were binding upon our Government as he must hold these binding.

Now, I will read the opinion of the Attorney-General. I read from the compiled volume of Opinions of the Attorney-General, volume 22, page 418, entitled "Cuba Cables," dated June 15, 1899; and I will only read a small portion covering the subject.

> Concessions of this kind, which carry with them exclusive rights for a period of years, constitute property of which the concessionary can no more be deprived arbitrarily and without lawful reason than it can be deprived of its personal tangible assets. In a case of the Supreme Court of the United States (1 Wall., 352) Mr. Justice Field said:
> "The United States have desired to act as a great nation, not seeking, in extending their authority over the ceded country, to enforce forfeitures, but to afford protection and security to all just rights which could have been claimed from the Government they superseded."
> If, therefore, the Western Union Telegraph Company has an exclusive grant applicable to Cuba for cable rights, which grant has not expired, it would be violative of all principles of justice to destroy its exclusive right by granting competing privileges to another company.
> It is suggested, however, in Mr. Mackay's letter that the grant which the Western Union Telegraph Company now holds, by lease or assignment, was obtained by fraud practiced on the Government of Spain, and that for that reason its grant is void.
> Such an allegation can not be fairly and justly tried upon a proceeding like this. Neither the War Department nor the Department of Justice has power to summon witnesses or to give a judgment upon this question. It is essentially a question for judicial examination and decision, and to determine such a matter in a proceeding of this kind would not only be irregular, but contrary to the ordinary rules and procedure practiced in such cases. Vested rights, which are property, ought not to be taken from anyone, even upon charges of fraud, except by due process of law. Executive action by the War Department applied to subjects like this is not due process of law.
> Mr. Mackay further submits that "the tremendous power of the Government should not be exercised against us."

Mr. Mackay thought our Government would let him steal a great public utility in Cuba. Now he has got the exclusive right in the Philippines—through his English ally—as I will show you a little later, and he wants to steal the public franchise from our people.

The opinion goes on to say:

> It is the function of the Government to prevent, so far as possible, all infringements of the vested rights of others. Mr. Mackay, through his company, proposes to set up a competitive cable line, which he concedes will greatly injure the business of the Western Union Company, and, although the latter company produces a grant which, on its face, gives it an exclusive right for a period which has not expired, he requests this Government to stand idly by while he does, with the acquiescence of the United States, the very thing which the Government of Spain, our predecessor in the sovereignty of Cuba, solemnly agreed not to do or permit to be done.

Now, I have cited that with some care, because I realize that the Eastern Extension Cable Company owns to-day the absolute door to China, to Japan, to the Philippine Islands, to the Marshall Islands, and held it by lawful grants from foreign nations before we became interested there, and we can not break down that monopoly except the Government undertakes the work itself.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CORLISS. I prefer to conclude my remarks, and after I have concluded I will answer any question that the gentleman desires. When the Eastern Extension Cable Company found that the British nation proposed to lay its Pacific cable, which would break down the monopoly, they held a meeting at London.

Mr. Mackay went there, whether by invitation or not I do not know, but he certainly went to London last August for the purpose of meeting the Eastern Extension Cable Company, and he there made a contract with the Eastern Extension Cable Company holding this exclusive grant, and that is admitted, and that contract provides that Mr. Mackay should come back to our country and incorporate an American company, which he did, with $100,000 capital, apply to the Government for permission to lay that cable, and he thought he could get it at once by saying that he would not ask for a subsidy.

Mind you, the men who were seeking to get the right to lay this cable in 1896 and 1897, and down to March, 1898, knew they could enter the Philippines Islands without interference; but when they learned that the Eastern Extension Cable Company, just before the Spanish war, had secured this grant, their right to enter was barred. The Extension Cable Company sought out an American who was willing to carry out their designs. It is to build this cable to Hawaii and possibly to the Marshall Islands, instead of Guam, connecting the last link in the cable around the world.

The Eastern Extension Cable Company have 70,000 miles of submarine cable, and I hold in my hand the books issued by that company in which is stated its leading corporations. They are the Eastern Extension Cable Company, the Australasia and China Telegraph Company, the West African Telegraph Company, the European and Azores Telegraph Company, and the Western and South African Telegraph Company. In addition to that is the Northern Telegraph Company running from Japan to Russia and around to the north. That corporation and the companies that are organized with it own and control 70,000 miles of cable, including, in my judgment, the Commercial Cable Company across the Atlantic. Why do I say that? Because their representative is in control and management of it, because they dictate what the Commercial Cable Company does.

If I have time I will touch upon that a little later; and, further than that, they control the Postal Telegraph Company, which is not a corporation. It was a corporation, but its property was transferred over to the Commercial Cable Company, so that they own to-day, with the Commercial Cable Company and the Postal Telegraph lines, communication from Manila around the world to California; and they own it in absolute control, and monopolize it. It is true they take messages from other cable companies. It is true that through Europe they take messages and send them. But they have charged for years a rate that has menaced England's interests until she has taken the step that I ask our people now to take.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman object to an interruption?

Mr. CORLISS. I prefer not to yield now. I hope the gentleman will make minute of his question, and I will answer it later.

Mr. Mackay telegraphed to the Secretary of State of the United States in August last that he wanted to lay this cable between California and the Philippine Islands upon the same conditions that were imposed upon other cable lines landing in this country. That is the purport of his message.

When he came back here and organized the Commercial Pacific Cable Company with a capital of only $100,000, and applied to the President for permission to land and lay his cable, he was confronted with the conditions heretofore imposed upon all cable companies landing cables in this country. I want to read some of those conditions. They were conditions imposed by President Grant, and James G. Blaine, and Mr. Olney, and President Cleveland, and all the other great men who represented our country in its executive capacity in matters of this kind, and who have persistently insisted that no company should land or operate a cable combination with any other company holding exclusive control or right upon foreign soil.

I want to read just two of those conditions, because they are significant. They are given by Mr. Mackay in his own proposition. They are embraced in three paragraphs of the proposition given by Mr. Mackay, in which he says in effect, "You let me lay this cable; I will furnish all the money; I will not ask a subsidy; I want no interference; I want no authority." Why? His third proposition is—

> To land said cable on American soil only, it being understood, however, that in case the depth around the island of Guam be too great to allow a cable landing on that island, the landing may be made elsewhere.

That is a little dangerous; it leaves it to go wherever he pleases. But here is the danger point:

> Not to receive from any foreign government exclusive privileges which would prevent the establishment and operation of the cable of an American company in the jurisdiction of such foreign government.

Now, the condition imposed upon all other companies in the United States expressly provides that no company shall operate a cable in conjunction with any other corporation holding an exclusive grant. Let me read it. These are the conditions imposed by President Grant and every other President by whom this subject has been considered, and ratified by act of Congress:

That neither the company, its successors or assigns, nor any cable with which it connects shall receive from any foreign government exclusive privileges which would prevent the establishment and operation of a cable of an American company in the jurisdiction of such foreign government.

It is a direct violation of that condition when he seeks to make a combination which he admits he has made with this company holding such exclusive rights.

2. That the company shall not consolidate or amalgamate with any other line or combine therewith for the purpose of regulating rates.

Now, how does Mr. Mackay get around that? This is his language:

Not to consolidate or amalgamate with any other line or combine therewith for the purpose of regulating rates, except to make through rates.

Well, that was all that was necessary to complete the combination. I want to ask members of this House whether they are willing by any vote that they may cast here to give a corporation a right to establish communication with another corporation having these exclusive rights, and then permit that company to combine with the other, which they have done, for the purpose of establishing rates.

That is in direct violation of the antitrust law, and when you vote for it you vote for one of the greatest monopolies and combinations on the face of the globe. It is in direct violation of law to permit that combination. Telegraphic communication is commerce. So the Supreme Court has held. No man knowing the facts should vote to give this Mackay corporation this right.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will my colleague consider now——

Mr. CORLISS. No, I will not consider it now. I want to proceed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I know that the gentleman's purpose——

Mr. CORLISS. The gentleman will pardon me now. I will give him hereafter all the time he wants.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I just wanted to call your attention to the matter of those concessions.

Mr. CORLISS. Not now.

I do not wish to occupy the time of the House unduly, but I want to read a letter written by Captain Squier, a letter which should be read by every man on this floor before he votes on this bill.

A MEMBER. Who is Captain Squier?

Mr. CORLISS. Capt. George O. Squier is a graduate of the United States Military Academy, having graduated some seventeen years ago, and is now in Army service. For a great many years he has been the executive officer in the active operation of cable lines and telegraph lines in the Signal Office of our Government.

He is undoubtedly, as Mr. HEPBURN said, the best expert in the United States upon that subject, because he has studied it. He knows the people representing these large interests; he knows what it costs to construct cables; he has laid 1,200 miles of cable connecting the islands in the Pacific; he has laid 5,000 miles of telegraph lines on the Philippine Islands, and he put up all the cables during the Spanish war. He is an authority upon this subject.

He is at this time in Washington, fortunately, after two years' service in the Philippine Islands in charge of the cable ship Burnside, and I wish to direct the attention of the committee to the fact that we have been progressing. We have a cable ship capable of laying a strand 1,000 or 2,000 miles long, in operation under the charge of Captain Squier. He has been in those islands for two years. He returned here only a week or ten days ago.

Knowing his superior knowledge and ability to any other man that lives in our country, admittedly the best expert of our Government, admittedly so by Mr. HEPBURN, chairman of our committee; I asked for his judgment, and a statement from him upon the important questions at issue here, and last Monday week he said to me if the Secretary of War would permit he would very gladly give me his judgment and the facts that he has learned from actual experience upon this important subject.

I have it here in writing, answering each question. No man should vote upon this bill until he reads it, and I could make no speech here that would be half as effective as the one contained in this letter.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Suppose you read the letter now.

Mr. CORLISS. Very well; I will ask the Clerk to read it at this time. It was written less than a week ago in answer to positive questions, such as I would like to have you gentlemen propound.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 3, 1902.

Hon. JOHN B. CORLISS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 2d of June, containing a list of inquiries concerning the establishment of an American trans-Pacific cable connecting the Philippine Islands with the United States, and asking for my views and judgment upon the points named.

The brief answers submitted herewith in favor of Government control are based upon the present military and naval needs of the United States to preserve her position in the Pacific Ocean, the promotion of American trade and commerce in the East, and the elevation and Americanization of the Philippine people.

It is a long-range view of the subject that is demanded at this time, when a telegraphic line connecting two hemispheres is to be laid for the first time. It is manifestly much less trouble to the United States, as far as the present moment is concerned, to allow a private corporation to lay a foreign-made cable in the Pacific by foreign cable ships, employing foreign skilled labor.

The easiest thing to do, however, is rarely the best thing to do, either for an individual or a nation.

Considering your inquiries in the order named in your letter, they are as follows:

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

1. It is an excellent principle to permit our private citizens to perform any service for the people which can be consistently and efficiently done, considering the interests involved. The trans-Pacific cable, however, is an enterprise of distinctly national, and even international, importance.

It would be as reasonable to turn over our postal system to the management of a few individuals for private gain as it would be to allow this particular cable to be controlled and managed by any private corporation.

The present monopoly which now controls the telegraphic communications to the Far East via Europe, will be perpetuated and enormously increased by permitting any private corporation which is allied to it in any way, to lay the first cable across the Pacific Ocean to the inestimable damage to the trade and commerce of the entire world for twenty-five years to come. The last link in the telegraphic circuit of the globe across the Pacific Ocean, in combination with the already existing monopoly, will furnish a telegraphic monopoly encircling the entire globe, which will operate to affect the future trade and commerce of the world in a manner not easy to realize.

The only possible method of breaking this monopoly, at present due to peculiar conditions obtaining, is for the United States Government itself to lay the connecting link and operate it at tariff rates in the interest of commerce and trade.

By permitting any corporation to lay the first cable across the Pacific the United States Government will virtually lock the door to the East, while the establishment of this enterprise by the Government will confer an ultimate blessing to civilization and trade, which will remain a monument to the wisdom and sagacity of this Government at a critical time.

2. Importance to the military and commercial influence of our nation.

A fully equipped cable plant in the United States is an absolute necessity at the earliest possible moment. This Government must be able to manufacture, lay, and repair submarine ocean cables, to maintain her military and naval prestige in the Pacific. The highest military and naval experts of the world now agree that exclusively controlled communications largely measure naval strength.

A cable plant is as necessary to the United States as an arsenal, a gun factory, or a navy-yard, and for the identical reasons. France and Germany within the last few years, since the paramount importance of cable communications as a means of national defense in time of war has been brought to the world's attention by the Spanish-American war, the Boer war in South Africa, and the recent disturbance in China, have each formulated a distinct "cable policy" as a part of their national defense scheme.

Germany has established a fully equipped cable plant at Cologne, Germany, and has recently built one of the finest cable ships in the world. France, through aid to private enterprise, has established a fully equipped cable plant at Havre and possesses cable ships fully equipped flying the French flag. Last year one of these ships, the Francois d'Arago, commanded by Lieutenant Mascart of the French navy, transported a French-made submarine cable to the Far East and connected the French possessions at Tonkin with Shanghai and will later complete the connection with the Siberian telegraph system, giving France colonial communication to Russia independent of England,

Germany last year likewise transported German-made cable in a German cable ship and connected her newly acquired territory in China (Kiaoutchau) to the telegraph system of the world. To allow the first trans-Pacific cable to the Philippines to be laid by foreign labor and foreign cable ships would be directly contrary to the sentiment of the late President McKinley in his special message to Congress upon this subject, in which he stated that this cable should be laid in such a way as to be "wholly under the control of the United States in peace and war."

Ability to repair and maintain this cable after it is laid by American cable ships is an absolute necessity to its control, and the placing of this great cable line under the control of foreign nations by not providing the means for maintaining it ourselves is a serious menace to our position in the Pacific.

We might as well neglect to provide dry docks and repair shops for our battle ships.

The establishment of a first-class cable plant upon American soil is more important to the United States at this time than the authorization of additional battle ships, for our own naval strategists, as well as those of other nations, agree that the very foundation of successful naval strategy is efficient and exclusively controlled communications, and the lack of them more serious than inferiority in ships.

The United States already has a fully equipped cable ship, the Burnside, in the Philippines, and had she possessed this ship in 1898 the naval problem of the Spanish-American war would have been immensely simplified.

3. Monopoly now held by Eastern Extension Cable Company.

The Eastern Extension Cable Company and its allied corporations now own the exclusive privilege of landing cables in the Philippine Islands for a period expiring May 8, 1940, and which also covers all Spanish islands, including Guam and the Marshall Islands, for a period of twenty years after such latter connections are made.

This exclusive monopoly is held to prevent any government or corporation other than the one named from landing cables in the Philippine Islands.

4. Who is furnishing the money for the Pacific Commercial Cable Company, and why?

I have no knowledge of the affairs of the Pacific Commercial Cable Company, or of its intentions, other than the testimony submitted to the Committee of Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives.

I do know, however, that the incorporators of the Pacific Commercial

Cable Company already own an Atlantic cable system, and also own a transcontinental land line system, namely, the Postal Telegraph system of the United States. It is also admitted in the testimony above referred to that this company has entered into an agreement with the Eastern Extension Cable Company and its allied corporations, which now controls telegraphic rates to the East, and holds an exclusive monopoly for landing cables in the Philippines.

It is also well known that the Eastern Extension Cable Company has a large amount of money invested in its present cable system to the Far East, and that the moment a cable is laid across the Pacific by this Government the annual receipts of the present systems via Europe will drop at least a million dollars a year.

It is also of record that the president of the board of directors of the Eastern Cable Company several times in his remarks at the annual meetings of this company in London, as published in the London technical journals, has shown that his company has been fully alive to the menace to their property which the construction of a trans-Pacific cable by any one not allied with them would cause.

It would be but a natural and wise business policy for these allied corporations to exhaust every means for either preventing any cable being laid across the Pacific, or stop all competitors by constructing the first span to Honolulu, or in the ultimate, to lay the entire cable across the Pacific to protect their property and extend their present monopoly to encircle the globe.

I have no knowledge that any money is being furnished by the Eastern Cable Company to the Pacific Commercial Cable Company.

The paramount question does not concern the Pacific Commercial Cable Company or any other private corporation, nor indeed the mooted theory of government versus private ownership. It is really that the situation demands an American-made cable across the Pacific, touching only American soil, controlled in peace and war by the United States, and operated for the people at the lowest possible tariff rates.

This can best be accomplished by the Government itself.

8. Why only one cable is necessary.

Those opposed to Government establishment of the Pacific cable maintain that to protect the communications the Government will be obliged to lay two cables immediately, at an expense of from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000. This is not true. One cable is all that is necessary at present until the demands of commerce construct several more cables.

The British Government itself, after eight years of one of the greatest contests known against this same cable monopoly, has finally decided to lay a Government cable connecting Canada with Australasia, to be owned, maintained, and operated by the Government itself, and this cable is now being manufactured for the British Government, and is under contract to be entirely completed by the 31st of December of this year.

These two trans-Pacific cables, therefore, will mutually protect each other, and in addition there will always be available the same routes, via Europe, as at present, in case of necessity. The argument, then, of the great expense of two cables at the outset has no foundation.

6. Cable monopoly from Hongkong to Manila. Number of lines. Revenue obtained during the past three years from our Government.

The only cable connecting the Philippine Archipelago with the telegraph system of the world is a single line from Manila to Hongkong—a monopoly of the Eastern Extension Cable Company, as referred to above. As to the revenue obtained from this single span of cable, I have endeavored to obtain from the office in Manilla data as to the amount of traffic carried over this system of cable, but it being contrary to the rules of the company to give out such information, it could not be secured. As to the revenue earned during the past three or four years from Government messages, a close estimate is easily made.

According to the annual report of the Secretary of War for the year 1899, the amount paid by the War Department alone for messages to and from the Philippines averaged at that time about $400,000 per annum, every word of which, as stated above, is obliged to pass over this cable. The Government rate at that time was $2.25½ per word, United States currency, so that the entire number of words paid for by the Government per annum would be about 180,000. The tariff rate from Manila to Hongkong—a distance of 628 miles—is 90 cents Mexican currency per word, or an average of 40 cents in United States currency.

The revenue, therefore, to the Eastern Extension Company per annum from the War Department alone, not considering the Navy Department or any commercial business, is approximately $72,000, which is the interest at 4 per cent on $1,800,000. The value of this line laid is, at a liberal estimate, $1,000 a mile, or represents approximately an invested capital of $630,000.

The rate charged by this company over this single span of cable to the public and the Government is nearly twice the rate from New York to London across the Atlantic, and as this company holds a monopoly no competing line has been laid.

6. Cost of cable and operation, etc.

The Pacific cable to the Philippine Islands can be manufactured and laid by the Government for not exceeding $10,000,000.

The cost of operation proper should not exceed $325,000 per annum, not including renewal nor interest on capital.

I believe that this particular cable can be laid cheaper by the Government than by a private company, as the resources of the Army and Navy and other executive departments of the Government would be available for the work.

During the last two years an interisland cable system connecting all of the principal islands of the Philippine Archipelago has been laid by the Signal Corps of the Army. The cable was American made, transported in an American cable ship, and laid in thirty different spans with success. I estimate that the carrying out of this work by the Government has resulted in a saving of at least $800,000 to the Government, and no private company could possibly have carried out this work under the conditions existing.

If the cable is operated by the Government for the people, the principle will be maximum service and minimum cost. If it is turned over to a private corporation, the principle will necessarily be maximum dividends at the expense of the people.

If the Government operates the cable, telegrams will be classified according to the urgency and differential tariffs charged therefor, with a view of operating the cable to its fullest capacity all the time.

Operated as above, this cable would be a paying investment from the outset, but I would be in favor of placing the rates so low as to just pay expenses.

The deficit in the Post-Office Department, according to the annual report of the Postmaster-General for the year 1897 was approximately eleven and one-half million dollars—more than enough to build the entire Pacific cable—and the Post-Office deficit for the five years from 1894 to 1898, inclusive, was nearly $48,000,000—enough to build five trans-Pacific cables, or one complete cable every year of that period.

Yet no one thinks of raising the rate of postage, and it is hardly possible to find a better method of expending a part of the revenues of our Government than in transmitting intelligence among our people, which is really the greatest civilizer on earth. England, realizing this, a few years ago established penny postage throughout her vast empire at an enormous deficit in operating expenses.

I can conceive of no better expenditure of public funds than in furnishing to all our people, to our trade and commerce, the benefits of the lowest possible rates of communication to our colonies in the East and to China and Japan. It is impossible to accomplish this to its fullest extent except by the Government itself.

8. Importance of cable news to the Philippines and facts with reference to subscriptions of officers for cablegrams.

To the American soldier in the Philippines one of his greatest trials is news isolation from the United States. Until a few months ago the only general news of the world which could be distributed to the American garrisons throughout the archipelago was the very brief dispatches furnished through Reuter's agency, which usually related to the Boer war or had a distinct European flavor.

What the American in the Philippines wants is American news, and this demand has been so great that a few months ago a movement was inaugurated, assisted by General Chaffee, by which a monthly subscription was obtained from officers, civil employees, and others throughout the archipelago, and so successful was this movement that an amount of money was raised which now furnishes to Manila daily a condensed news cablegram from the United States.

General Chaffee has thrown open the entire Government interland telegraph system free for the distribution of this daily cable news message, and at noon each day it is distributed to every telegraph station and commanding officer of troops in the Philippine Archipelago. As the Government now has in operation over 5,000 miles of telegraph land lines and 30 separate interisland cables, aggregating over 1,300 miles, this daily cablegram practically reaches all parts of the Philippines.

The cable company furnishes no reduction for this service other than the Associated Press rate. The effect of this enterprise has been wonderful, and the investment involved is now a personal tax upon those who are required to serve in the Philippines.

Very truly, yours,

GEORGE O. SQUIER,
Captain, Signal Corps, U. S. A.

Mr. CORLISS. We ought to look at other governments and what they are doing as a guide for ourselves. We know what England has done. She is laying her Pacific cable to-day. It will be laid by next January. She has agreed to give her trade and commerce a rate over her line of 50 cents a word, connecting all her territories clear to Australia—50 cents a word, one-half what this Mackay combination proposes to charge.

Great Britain does this, first, to absolutely control her military power and to maintain it; second, to extend her trade and commerce. She has nearly encircled the globe with Government cables, except where this company has held her back and prevented. Now, then, what has France and Germany done? France two years ago authorized the payment of $800,000 to a private corporation to build a cable plant in France, which has been built, and has completed for the French Government itself four great Government lines in the last three years. Those lines I have set forth in the report on this bill.

France has gone into China and laid a Government cable from her possessions to Shanghai, in defiance of this corporation and its exclusive rights. It is true she did not get into China, but she landed on an island outside. She put her Government cable right up through the Pacific, connecting her possessions with an island near Shanghai, the New York of China, and there maintains it in communication with the Danish telegraph lines from Japan.

In the last few years she has built four Government lines to South Africa, in order to separate herself from the control of the English corporations and the English Government lines. What has Germany done? Germany has the Marshall Islands. Those in the yellow on the map before you are the German islands, known as the Caroline, the Marshall Islands, and the Pelew Islands. Germany owns those; obtained them from Spain.

There is upon the Marshall and the Pelew islands the same concession that we have to confront. What has Germany done? She has gone to work and constructed a Government cable from the Marshall Islands to the Caroline Islands and thence to the Pelew, and in order to strengthen herself she joined hands with the Dutch Government, and I hold in my hand a certified copy from the Secretary of State of that agreement between Germany and the Kingdom of Holland.

Mr. LESSLER. Denmark you mean, do you not?

Mr. CORLISS. I mean Holland. This agreement is only a few months old. I will not stop to find the date, but it is within six months.

Now, those two Governments, with only those little islands in the Pacific, have made a contract by which Holland undertakes to join her islands with the German islands by two Government cables, and Holland agrees to build over from here to the Pelew Islands, and the German Government agrees to build a Government cable connecting them, and then the two Governments agree to join and extend the line to Shanghai. Why? To get out of the clutches of this English cable company.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied one hour.

Mr. CORLISS. I believe I have the right to control two hours.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the duty of the Chair to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that he has consumed one hour. Of course, as he controls the time he can resume.

Mr. CORLISS. I do not want to trespass too much upon the time of others, but I wish to conclude my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. There are some other matters to come up in the House.

Mr. CORLISS. Then I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5) to authorize the construction, operation, and maintenance of telegraphic cables between the United States of America and Hawaii, Guam, and Philippine Islands, and other countries, and to promote commerce, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ISSUANCE OF PASSPORTS.

Mr. FORAKER. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8129) to amend sections 4076, 4078, and 4075 of the Revised Statutes, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 4075 of the Revised Statutes of the United States by inserting after the phrase "consular officers of the United States" the following: "and by such chief or other executive officer of the insular possessions of the United States."

It proposes to amend section 4076 of the Revised Statutes so as to read as follows:

No passport shall be granted or issued to or verified for any other persons than those owing allegiance, whether citizens or not, to the United States.

It proposes to amend section 4078 so as to read:

If any person acting or claiming to act in any office or capacity under the United States, its possessions, or any of the States of the United States, who shall not be lawfully authorized so to do, shall grant, issue, or verify any passport or other instrument in the nature of a passport to or for any person whomsoever, or if any consular officer who shall be authorized to grant, issue, or verify passports shall knowingly and willfully grant, issue, or verify any such passport to or for any person not owing allegiance, whether a citizen or not, to the United States, he shall be imprisoned for not more than one year or fined not more than $500, or both; and may be charged, proceeded against, tried, convicted, and dealt with therefor in the district where he may be arrested or in custody.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio, who undoubtedly has reflected upon the matter more than I have, whether in his judgment it is quite a compliance with the constitutional provision that a criminal must be tried in a district previously ascertained by law, to provide that he may be tried in any district where he happens to be in custody. Would there be any harm in avoiding that question by specifying some district in which the man shall be tried?

Mr. FORAKER. If I understand the inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts, it has no relevancy to the bill which has just been read. The bill which has just been read proposes to amend three certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to authorize the granting of passports to those who owe allegiance, without regard to whether they have been called by law citizens of the United States or not.

Mr. HOAR. But as I understand the bill as read it provides in substance, whatever the phrase is, that any official who shall knowingly issue a passport to a person not entitled under the law shall be tried in any district where he happens to be in custody. I do not know whether that is new or a part of the old law. I merely have heard it read. If it be new, then the question would arise—the Constitution providing that every person charged with a criminal offense shall be tried in a district previously ascertained by law—whether it is a compliance with that provision to say he shall be tried in any district of the United States where he happens to be in custody.

Mr. FORAKER. The law in that particular is not changed. The only change that is made is to insert language so as to make the law applicable to the granting of passports apply to the citizens of Porto Rico, who are entitled to the protection of the United States, and to the citizens of the Philippine Islands, who are entitled to the protection of the United States, if the bill which has passed the Senate shall become a law by passing the House. The State Department have had many applications naturally for the granting of passports to such persons, and inasmuch as the power to grant passports is given only as to citizens of the United States they can not within the strict letter of the statute give a passport. This is simply to enlarge their powers.

Mr. HOAR. There is no objection on that score. If the Senator on hearing the point concludes that there is no constitutional difficulty in the provision I shall not press the objection, but I call his attention to it.

Mr. SPOONER. This is a bill which comes from the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. I thought the phase of it to which the Senator from Massachusetts has called attention had been omitted.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I thought there was a sort of understanding that the clause is objectionable which provides that a man may be tried where he happens to be in custody, irrespective of the question whether it is where the offense had been committed. I do not know whether the present law contains that provision, but I had, I know, serious doubts about its validity.

Mr. HOAR. I do not like to be meddling with carefully revised legislation coming from other committees, especially so learned and able a committee as the Committee on Foreign Relations, but it seems to me that the question is one worth looking at.

Mr. FORAKER. We did not think it advisable in considering this bill, which had passed the House, to undertake to amend the law as it now stands. The law, as it now stands, on that point is precisely as it is in this bill, the only change being such a change in the text as will make it applicable to citizens of Porto Rico or citizens of other insular possessions who may owe us allegiance and are entitled to protection, and who ought to be able to get from somebody a passport if they want to travel abroad.

I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the section as it now stands in the Revised Statutes, if he cares that I pursue the matter further.

SEC. 4078. If any person acting, or claiming to act, in any office or capacity under the United States, or any of the States of the United States, who shall not be lawfully authorized so to do, shall grant, issue, or verify any passport, or other instrument in the nature of a passport, to or for any citizen of the United States, or to or for any person claiming to be or designated as such in such passport or verification, or if any consular officer who shall be authorized to grant, issue, or verify passports, shall knowingly and willfully grant, issue, or verify any such passport to or for any person not a citizen of the United States, he shall be imprisoned for not more than one year, or fined not more than $500, or both; and may be charged, proceeded against, tried, convicted, and dealt with therefor in the district where he may be arrested or in custody.

I read that fully simply to show that there is no change in this respect proposed by the bill under consideration in the text of the statute as it now stands.

Mr. HOAR. As I said before, I shall not delay the bill at this time of the session with an objection. I do not at present, I confess, see how under the Constitution that can stand, but if the Senator is satisfied with it I shall make no further objection.

Mr. FORAKER. As I said a moment ago, I do not desire to raise any question about the law as it now stands, and I did not raise any in the committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 6127) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Fraze; and

A bill (S. 6128) granting an increase of pension to Jane Riner (with an accompanying paper).

Mr. KEARNS introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 6129) granting a pension to Charles Crimson, jr.

A bill (S. 6130) granting an increase of pension to John E. Henderson; and

A bill (S. 6131) granting a pension to Frank Clark.

Mr. McCUMBER introduced a bill (S. 6132) granting an increase of pension to Fannie McHarg; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MARTIN introduced a bill (S. 6133) for the relief of the estate of James L. Miller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GAMBLE introduced a bill (S. 6138) to set apart certain lands in the State of South Dakota as a public park, to be known as the Wind Cave National Park; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

DAM ACROSS THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11657) allowing the construction of a dam across the St. Lawrence River. I think there is no opposition to it from any quarter.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

REBECCA J. TAYLOR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CARMACK, as follows:

Whereas it appears that Rebecca J. Taylor, late a clerk in the War Department, holding a position in the classified service, was, by order of the Secretary of War, discharged from her position on the 7th day of June, 1902: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States of America, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be instructed to inquire and report the reasons for such discharge and whether the same was made in accordance with law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

Mr. BERRY. I think there was a unanimous-consent agreement that the motion to discharge the Committee on Privileges and Elections from the further consideration of the joint resolution in regard to the election of Senators should come up this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was a unanimous-consent agreement that it should go over subject to call.

Mr. STEWART. I ask the Senator to let me get up this bill——

Mr. BERRY. I understood that it had gone over from day to day, always coming in after the routine morning business, and then an agreement was made that at the conclusion of the routine morning business to-day the Chair should lay it before the Senate. That is my understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unanimous-consent agreement was that it might lie on the table subject to be called up. The Senator can call it up at any time he pleases.

Mr. HOAR. It is practically the same thing, I desire to say to the Senator.

Mr. BERRY. I ask that it be laid before the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that will not be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas interpose against the pending resolution?

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Tennessee yields, I understand.

Mr. CARMACK. Let it go over without losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over.

Mr. HOAR. What goes over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] touching an investigation of the discharge from her position in the classified service of a Miss Taylor.

ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks that there be taken from the table the following motion——

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will not press that motion until I can dispose of the motion to reconsider the Choctaw treaty. I have given notice of it for several mornings, and I have been trying to get it up.

Mr. BERRY. The motion has been on the table for a week or ten days. It went over on account of the Philippine matter. I can not consent that it shall go over again.

Mr. STEWART. I hope it will not be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas has a right to have it taken up.

Mr. STEWART. Without a motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; without a motion.

Mr. HALE. I think it was on my suggestion that this matter went over. As I recollect, the Senator from Arkansas moved to discharge the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I called his attention to the fact that the chairman of the committee was absent, and that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who is very much interested in the measure, was absent, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], I think, suggested that the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], another important member of the committee, was absent. I asked the Senator not to make his motion on that day, and he very readily seeing the situation, said he did not want to take it up in the absence of those Senators and suggested that he would make it the next day. But after that suggestions were made that it go over still further, and Wednesday, to-day, was fixed upon, and I suppose the motion of the Senator comes up this morning.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will permit me, it did not require any motion. It was under the previous unanimous agreement that it went over until to-day without losing its place. When I moved to take it up, it was stated by the Senator, as he said, that the Senators named were absent, and he suggested that it go over until Tuesday or Wednesday. Finally, I said, "We will agree that it shall come up on Wednesday morning," and I think the RECORD will show it was agreed that the Chair should lay it before the Senate on Wednesday morning, by which time the Senator from Massachusetts and others would have an opportunity to be here.

Mr. HALE. There is no issue between us as to what was agreed upon as to time. My recollection may be incorrect, but it is that the Senator had moved to discharge the committee.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON] a week or ten days ago moved to discharge the committee. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] asked that it go over until the next morning, and it went over until the next day, when the Senator from Massachusetts offered a substitute for that motion. It then went over without losing its place, the Philippine measure being on hand. It went over from day to day in that way, and that measure was disposed of. I then asked that the Chair lay it before the Senate, as it had been holding its place from time to time. The Senator from Maine who now occupies the floor objected on account of the absence of the Senators named, and it was thereupon agreed, as I think the RECORD will show, that it should go over until this morning.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BERRY. I submit that it does not require any motion, and it is laid before the Senate in regular course. That is the point I make.

Mr. HALE. I do not make the point that it requires a motion. I may be incorrect, but even when it went over the Senator's motion to discharge the committee was pending. If the Senator did not make that motion, then I am mistaken. If he made that motion, the whole matter went over until this morning, and that motion is now pending. That will depend upon whether he made the motion. I understood that he had made it.

Mr. STEWART. May I inquire of the Chair what the motion is?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HALE. What took place before the unanimous-consent agreement? What was the action of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HALE. I do not ask that that be read.

Mr. STEWART. Let us hear what it is.

Mr. HALE. What took place before the agreement? The matter came before the Senate by some action on the part of the Senator from Arkansas. Now, what was that action?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion was made that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the motion to discharge the committee.

Mr. HALE. That is what I thought. It was a motion to discharge the committee, and that went over.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to have the RECORD read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read from the proceedings of June 6, 1902, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] asks unanimous consent that the resolution lie on the table, subject to be called up on Wednesday morning next. Is there objection?

Mr. MCCOMAS. Before that is done, I only want a moment to say that there are not many Senators now present, and, as has been stated by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections [Mr. BURROWS] is not present; the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], who has a substitute for the resolution, is not present, and I do not know that he will be, and the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], who proposed an amendment vital in this matter, is not present, and I do not know that he will be. Would it not be well, therefore, to let the matter go over until Monday, and then fix a day?

Mr. BERRY. No, Mr. President; I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to ask a question before we consent to the arrangement. This resolution, of course, will not interfere with the order of business at 2 o'clock, if it is taken up on Wednesday morning. The unanimous consent will only apply, as I understand, to the morning hour?

Mr. BERRY. So I understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understood the request.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely desire to have that understood.

Mr. MCCOMAS. My only anxiety is whether that will give sufficient time for the absent Senators to be present.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is notice enough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY]? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. HALE. Now, what I want to know is what the situation was when it went over. If the Secretary will read the proceedings in the Senate that led to the suggestion of the matter going over I will be very much obliged. It came before the Senate in some way. What was the motion of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BERRY. The motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON] was to discharge the Committee on Privileges and Elections from the further consideration of the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution to elect United States Senators by the people. The Senator from Massachusetts objected to that.

Mr. HALE. I am not talking about what took place the day before.

Mr. BERRY. Well, I am coming along to it. The next morning the Senator from Massachusetts offered a substitute or an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Maryland. It was not disposed of when some other matter came up, and then it was agreed that it should go over without losing its place on the table; that is all.

Mr. HALE. Now, I want to know what took place on Friday or whatever day it was, when this matter came up and the agreement was made that it should go over. Let the Secretary state what the RECORD shows. There was some motion made. The Senator from Arkansas made a motion. I want to know what it was. I want to know what we are doing.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understand that there was no motion made in connection with it.

Mr. HALE. I want to see what the RECORD shows.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The original motion, as suggested by my colleague, was made by the Senator from Maryland. That motion was pending and as a matter of right it was laid before the Senate the next morning. It having been objected to at the time it was made, the presiding officer must lay it before the Senate the next day. The next day there was not time to consider it, and by unanimous consent it went over to another day, to this particular day specified, and it has exactly the same right to-day that it had when it came over the day after it was made.

Mr. HALE. That is, the motion to discharge the committee, made either by the Senator from Arkansas or the Senator from Maryland, is now pending.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes, sir; that is my understanding of it.

Mr. HALE. That is my understanding. I do not care who made the motion. I know that is what came over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON] to discharge the Committee on Privileges and Elections from the further consideration of the joint resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. I take it, Mr. President, that the continued refusal of the committee to report the joint resolution providing for an amendment to the Constitution authorizing the election of Senators by popular vote may as well be considered as bringing, by this motion, the merits of the joint resolution before the Senate, and with that view of the situation I desire to submit a few remarks relative to the joint resolution itself.

Certain objections are made to the proposition to amend the Constitution and provide for the election of Senators by a direct vote.

The first objection which I note, one which was urged by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], is that it violates the pledge which was given in the adoption of the Constitution in that clause of the Constitution which provides that as to an equal number of Senators to each State there shall be no amendment without the consent of every State. It seems to me, with due deference to the distinguished Senator, that such a contention can not be successfully made. The language referred to in the Constitution itself is:

And that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

It seems to me to go without argument that that applies not to the manner in which Senators shall be elected, but to the number which each State shall have relatively with the other States, a number that was agreed upon in the convention to be two to each State.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator proceeds with his proposition, I ask him to allow me to call his attention to one point. There should also be read in that connection the definition of the Senate. My point is that a body of a certain character, defined in a certain way by the Constitution, was established; and to say that you shall not have a body of that kind any longer is to say that there shall not be any Senate hereafter. Now, will the Senator be good enough to read in that connection what is said of the Senate?

Mr. CLAPP. It is unnecessary to read it, because I concede that the American Constitution provides that the Senate shall consist of men elected by States legislatures. I think that covers the suggestion.

Mr. HOAR. That is the point.

Mr. CLAPP. Now, when we come to the provision which guarantees to every State its equal representation, I answer that the word "equal" there can have no significance and no reference except to numbers itself, and can not apply to the manner in which Senators are to be elected. I submit that there can be no successful contradiction of that proposition. The language of the Constitution is:

And that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of—

What? Of representation in the Senate, of Senators, as by this instrument it is provided shall be elected? No; but—shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

The word that relates to proportion, the word that relates to numbers is used there. The word "equal" limits the significance of that provision. It seems to me, I repeat, that there can be no question but what that was simply a pledge that each State should be entitled to its equal proportion of Senators, and should not be deprived of that proportion without its own consent.

The next objection that is made to this proposition is that it overturns the policy of the fathers of the Constitution in a controversy which they waged with one another and out of which the election of Senators by the legislature was finally accepted as a compromise. I am willing to concede that that view does prevail as a popular impression; I am willing to concede that that is the conclusion reiterated time and again by the commentators upon the American Constitution; but I challenge the correctness of that statement, in view of the expressions found in the debates that preceded the adoption of the Constitution itself.

Mr. President, the controversy over the election of Senators did not begin with Senators. It began with the primary proposition of the election of the lower House of Congress. The debate upon that question produced three distinct propositions. One was that the members of the lower House of Congress should be elected directly by the people; another was that they should be elected by the legislatures, and still another was that they should be nominated by the legislatures and elected by the people. The conditions which then prevailed were somewhat peculiar. It was a period of reaction against former conditions.

The Revolutionary war had been waged and brought to a successful termination by such men as Thomas Jefferson arousing the latent forces of democracy, but no sooner was the war successfully terminated than the men who had used the powers of democracy in the prosecution of the war itself became alarmed at the idea and spirit of democracy, and running all through the debates in the Constitutional Convention is the evidence of alarm on the part of the leaders of that day at what they regarded as vesting too much power in the people themselves.

The controversy on the election of members of Congress turned upon that question, and such men as Rutledge, Pinckney, Gerry, Sherman, and others (quoting now from memory, I may not get their names exactly accurate), were opposed to the people selecting the lower House of Congress, the question of the election of Senators not yet having arisen.

Mr. Madison was one of the chief exponents of the popular election of the members of the lower House, and the matter was finally compromised by providing that the members of the lower House should be elected by popular vote.

They then proceeded to the consideration of the manner in which Senators should be elected, and Gerry was driven from every stronghold which he had sought to occupy in his resistance to the right of the people to participate in the Government. He made the appeal to some of the men who were in sympathy with the doctrine of State sovereignty that the election of Senators by the legislatures would in a measure extinguish and wipe out State sovereignty. But that was a mere incident to the discussion. The great controversy that was waged was whether the people should elect the Senators, or whether the Senators should be sifted, as Pinckney said, through the legislature, it being Pinckney's idea that the Senate should occupy as near as possible a position in comparison with that of the House of Lords of England.

Finally as a compromise not as to the relation of the State and Federal Government, but as a compromise upon the broad question as to who should elect the Senators, it was decided that the Senators should be elected by the legislatures.

The idea that the Senator represents the sovereignty of the State finds no warrant in the fact that he is elected by the legislature. The sovereignty of the State, that special identity which we call the State, consists not of a legislature, but it consists of legislative, judicial, and executive departments; and it might as well be said that if the Senator was appointed by the chief justice of the supreme court of a State he represented the sovereign character of his State.

But, Mr. President, there is another objection urged to this proposed change in the election of Senators, and that is that we are violating one of the cardinal tenets of the fathers; that this is the first time that an effort has ever been made to materially and radically change the policy of this Government. I submit that the history of this Government does not warrant that statement. No man can hold in higher reverence the memory of the fathers than do I; but, before we should be bound by precedent, we must recognize two great truths: First, the fallible nature of man; and second, the impossibility of any man, I care not how able, how great, how wise he may be, anticipating the needs of the future.

When we apply this principle to the idea of government, we have got to recognize another great principle, and that is, in all human history there never was an attempt made to formulate a rigid and fixed scheme of government that it did not fail because it failed to recognize the changes in conditions that time would bring.

The American Constitution would have been no exception to this rule had it not contained within itself the elements of its own modification. But, sir, even then it would have proved a disastrous failure had it not been that the American people were great enough, wise enough, and patriotic enough to change the fundamental principle and policy of our Government without even resorting to the measure provided in the Constitution itself for effecting such a change. Scarce was the ink dry with which the Constitution was written until, notwithstanding the wisdom of the fathers, it was found necessary to begin its modifications by the process of amendment.

It is said that the earlier amendments were only designed to carry into effect the spirit and purpose of the Constitution itself. That may be, but the thirteenth amendment stands out either as merely vapid declamation or as a radical change in the policy of the Government. Either under the original Constitution slavery was permissible—and if so, the amendment reversing that policy reversed it as to an important and material policy—or it was not permissible, and that amendment was mere idle surplusage.

But we go further than that. In the early history of this country it was contended almost generally that the Government must be limited to the primary functions of government itself. During the days when the presence and the memory of the fathers of the Constitution still lingered in our midst, that was a view which was universally and generally accepted; but in the process of time we began a radical change.

We began to yoke government side by side with the industrial and economic forces, and to-day in this Chamber the proposition is being debated of invoking the functions of government, not for development within our own borders, but that we may go into the Treasury of this nation and take untold millions and go into a foreign land and there inaugurate and carry forward the purchase, building, and maintenance and operation of railroads and canals. I submit that there was not a man in that great deliberative body that gave to the world the American Constitution that ever dreamed that that was one of the functions for which the Government they framed was being organized.

But, sir, even in a more marked respect than that we have changed the fundamental policy of our Government. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in his speech referred to the fact that in yonder hall sits a tribunal that holds within bounds all the vast powers of a great nation as the law of gravitation holds in check the stars and the planets in their order. It is true that that tribunal sits there to-day; but, Mr. President, that is not the tribunal that the fathers of this country gave us when they formulated and gave forth this Constitution.

A little more than a hundred years ago John Jay was offered the position of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. He declined that offer upon the ground that that court did not possess the power and authority to maintain its own dignity or to serve the interests of the American people, and he had some warrant for that when we realize that the governor of Pennsylvania had called out the militia to resist the mandates of the Supreme Court and when the State of Georgia had passed a law making it a misdemeanor to carry into effect the mandates of the Supreme Court of the United States.

John Marshall was finally offered the position, and he accepted it. I will not weary the Senate this morning with discussing the evidence as to what position the Supreme Court occupied in the minds of the founders of this Government. They undertook to establish three coordinate branches of the Government. You might take a spiritual or divine essence and divide it into branches coordinate, if you please, but you never could have three coordinate human agencies. Somewhere above the warring interests of the three there must be a power to regulate, or one of those three must of itself assume that authority.

Chief Justice Marshall took that position; and I bring him to-day as a witness upon the proposition that it was never understood or dreamed of that the Supreme Court, or the judicial branch of the Government, could set aside the act of what was deemed the great popular department of the Government—the legislative. Less than a year before he took that seat he declared, in the Ware case, that the court had no authority to set aside an act of the Legislature as void because it contravened the constitutional limitation.

But when he occupied that position and assumed that high office he soon discovered what the genius of American citizenship was bound sooner or later to discover, and that was that somewhere in this organization there had to be some power which could judge between conflicting interests and warring powers, and he arrogated—and I use that word advisedly—that power to the Supreme Court, when he declared that it was for the court to point out what the law was; and if an act of Congress contravened what the court declared to be the law, that then the act of Congress failed, because it would not be a law in the light of the declared will of the tribunal itself. In other words, with one stroke of his pen he placed the Supreme Court above the legislative department, not only as to those questions that go to the rights of citizens, but that court has gone on until to-day the American people, and wisely, too, recognize the right of that court to regulate the governmental and political policies of this great nation by calling a halt upon legislative enactment.

That tribunal sits there to-day, but it is not the tribunal that the fathers of our country created.

I can not take the time to dwell at length upon the struggle by which this was accomplished, but every lawyer is familiar with the history of that controversy, every layman is familiar with the fact that to-day it sits in yonder chamber and there is no appeal from its decisions in the path of peace; and it sits there the most august tribunal on earth; but I frankly submit that its position to-day is an absolute reversal of the policy, the purpose, and the will of the founders of this Government.

But, sir, in another important respect we have departed from the policy of the fathers and reversed their purposes. When the Constitution was under debate, a proposition was made to clothe the Federal Government with power to coerce a recreant State. Madison declared that that could not be; that to attempt to force a State would be to declare war and annul the compact between the States, and the proposition was unceremoniously dismissed. It is a singular coincidence that fifty years later Attorney-General Black, in speaking of this same question in an opinion addressed to Mr. Buchanan, who was then President, declared that the Federal Government had no power or right to invade a State for coercive purposes, and that an invasion of a State for such purposes would of itself work its expulsion from the Union.

In the Virginia plan of the constitution the word "nation" appears twenty-six times, I think, and yet by one resolution it was stricken out wherever it occurred in the proposed constitution, and the great principle that the citizen owed his superior allegiance to the Federal Government and not to the State government never again received authoritative recognition, except from the decisions of the Supreme Court, until the State of Nevada gave forth a constitution, one drawn, I believe, by the present junior Senator from that State [Mr. STEWART], followed a few months later by Maryland. But it was as absolutely impossible to have two sovereignties in one as it was to have three coordinate human agencies. One must rise above the others and place a check on the relations between the two.

John Marshall by one stroke of the pen forever banished the word "compact," when he said that the Constitution should be read and understood as words were commonly understood, not by the men who framed it, for that would be the law of interpretation as to contracts and compacts, but as understood by the men for whom it was intended, which would be the law of interpretation of law itself.

He then proceeded to go further and decided that while the Federal Government is only a Government of limited powers, yet it is for the Federal Government itself to determine what the limitations are. What, then, became, so far as judicial construction is concerned, of the idea of coordinate sovereignty, if the Federal Government was clothed with the power to determine its own limitations? There was absolutely no limitation left upon the Federal power except the own judgment, the wisdom, and patriotism exercised in determining the limitation itself. That position was maintained. He sat there after the political complexion of the court changed, but the American people had recognized that great principle, and the principle survived, until finally, on the battlefields of this Republic, the manhood of this country wrote that principle in letters of blood into the spirit and policy of American Government.

I submit, Mr. President, in all fairness and candor, if that is not a complete reversal of the policy, the purpose, and the plan of the fathers of this country as enunciated in the Constitution itself. Certainly it is above the rank of mere trivial correction, as is suggested in one of the speeches in opposition to this proposed amendment.

Mr. President, these illustrations simply serve two purposes: First, to show the necessity for change as changes became necessary; and secondly, to show that we should not always yield blind obedience to a theory simply because it is sanctioned by long observance.

But, for all that, we ought not to make a change unless there is some reason for a change.

The fourth objection which is urged to the constitutional amendment making the office of Senator elective is that it would destroy the independence of Senators and break down the personality of the Senate in the fact that it would shorten the career of members of the Senate. With all due deference to those who advocate that view, it has seemed to me for years—and during all these years the principle has never grown with such intensity as within the year and a half I have been permitted to be a member of this body—that this is the very reason why the change ought to be made. Instead of striking down the independence of a Senator or weakening his tenure of office, a popular election and appeal to the people would add to his independence and strengthen his tenure of office, and I propose to demonstrate that by the lives and careers of the very men who most strongly and strenuously oppose this change.

There are any number of men amply equipped by their natural ability to present, discuss, and administer great public questions who are absolutely lacking in the ability to manipulate caucuses, conventions, and legislatures. To-day the difficulty which a Senator experiences during what I am going to call his crucial experience—I know of no better term, and I may use that a time or two again—is to maintain the proper relation of a political and personal character with a few leaders scattered through his State and who are powerful factors in their relation to legislative forces.

The man who succeeds in passing that point and possesses the ability and reaches a position where he is recognized as one amply qualified to be all a Senator should be is the man who serves out the long career in this body. I undertake to say that there is nothing that would so add to the independence of the Senator as to relieve him of this personal political relation and place the Senator where, ignoring leaders, ignoring legislatures, he can take his stand upon broad public questions and appeal to his entire constituency in that manner, and you then place him in a position of independence and strength.

Now, I appeal to Senators if their experience and observation does not confirm this statement. Take the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], a man who to-day is recognized as admired and respected throughout the length and breadth of this nation. He is not here because of his skill in manipulating conventions and legislatures, but because he has won such a place in the hearts and in the minds of his people that the act of the legislature in selecting him is a mere ratification of the popular will. He stands here to-day, and let us hope that he will—and he will by the will of his people—until nature shall demand the payment of nature's great and last debt.

I turn to the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], a man who not only has the respect and confidence of his people, of the members of this body, and of the American people, but, if I may use the term in connection with that life which men live in the association of politics, he has the love of all, and he stands here to-day, why? Because of his ability to manipulate conventions? No. No man whose mere dictum is recognized the length and breadth of this land upon a constitutional question can be an adept in the matter of managing and manipulating caucuses and conventions.

So I might go on along the line. It is the experience of every man in this body that just in proportion as a man gets away from the legislature, as he gets away from those political and personal relations and becomes strong in the confidence of his people, he becomes free and independent, and his tenure in office is increased.

Mr. President, it has been suggested in one of the speeches in opposition to the election of Senators by the people, that the Senate must defend itself against a popular uprising. Let me suggest that the Senate has not defended itself, and the Senate can not defend itself against the purposes and the will of the American people to participate directly in the election of United States Senators.

It has been suggested that this movement is a mere mushroom movement; that it is actuated by a few typewritten letters scattered throughout the country. If that is so, why is it that State after State has taken every means in its power within the limitations of this Constitution to make the office of United States Senator elective?

A few days ago we congratulated the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] upon the fact that a primary election, an appeal to the people, had been had, and it had been determined in his favor. Will any man in this Chamber say that that Senator is less independent, will any man say that his tenure of office is less secure, because the people of his State have pronounced their verdict and declared that he shall succeed himself?

A few days ago we congratulated the junior Senator from the State of South Dakota [Mr. KITTREDGE] upon what? Upon his having managed to control the legislature? No; but upon the absolute failure of the Senate to defend itself against the efforts of the people to participate in the election of Senators, because a convention had been called in his State and nominated him for the office of Senator, and his election follows as a mere sequence.

Will anyone assert that he is less independent because of this popular expression of the will of the people of his State?

This is something more than a mere mushroom growth inspired by typewritten letters scattered throughout the country. It is an earnest on the part of the people of their determination in some way or other to be heard and to take part in the selection of United States Senators.

There is evidence of the fact that State after State, especially in the South and West, has, either by conventions or primary elections, gone just as far as it could in this direction. It is not all confined to the West, either, but the placid, slumbering bosom of Pennsylvania politics has been disturbed by these pulsations of public sentiment, and last winter, if I remember correctly, the legislature of that State declared in favor of the popular election of United States Senators.

Now, why attempt to dam up this overwhelming and ever-increasing force of public sentiment? Why force the people of this country in a roundabout way to accomplish that which they ask at our hands to be permitted to accomplish in a plain and direct way?

Mr. President, there is one other phase of this question, and that is the attempt to frighten certain members of the Senate from its support upon the theory that if we change the Constitution as to the election of Senators we must of necessity change the basis of representation.

I appeal to Senators, to whom that threat is made in the hope of frightening them from the support of this measure, if my contention is not right, namely, that no State can, without the consent of that State itself, be deprived of the right to send two Senators here in whatever way the law may prescribe. It is a false alarm, designed to drive the real friends of this measure from its support.

It is possible that this resolution at this time will be defeated, but, as I said before, you can not stay the force of public will—for it is more than mere sentiment when the people of this country, by every means left to them under the Constitution, seek to make the office of United States Senator, as it should be, an elective office.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I ask for a vote on the motion to discharge the committee.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question before I am called on to vote. When this matter was up some days ago, the day the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] made his report, I made two inquiries then which had the same object which I now have in view. I desire to ask the Senator whether the committee in making the report which has been made through him, intended that that should be indicative of the desire on the part of the members of the committee to be discharged from the further consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator, I will state that my impression is that it was not so intended; that the object of the committee, as I understood, was to advise the Senate of the progress made by the committee in the consideration of this question. No desire was expressed one way or the other as to the discharge of the committee; but I was simply directed to report the status to the Senate, and leave it for the consideration of the Senate whether the committee should continue its consideration of the measure or whether the Senate preferred to take it into its own hands.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator if the committee is still considering the measure?

Mr. BURROWS. The joint resolution is still before the committee, but since the motion to discharge the committee was made the committee have not considered the joint resolution; but when this motion is disposed of, if the committee is not discharged, of course it will resume the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BLACKBURN. May I ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the chairman believe that it is possible, after the votes taken in that committee upon this joint resolution, for that committee ever to report it to the Senate, either favorably or unfavorably, as it came from the House of Representatives, or as it has been amended, or as it can ever possibly be amended? I will make the question shorter. Does not the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections believe—is he not satisfied—that the only way that that joint resolution will ever come out of that committee will be for the Senate to take it out by a vote discharging the committee from its further consideration?

Mr. BURROWS. No; I would not be prepared to say that. All I can say is that if the Senate shall refuse to discharge the committee—which I hope it will—the committee will resume the consideration of the joint resolution and do the best it can to reach a conclusion.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then, Mr. President, in this connection I want to say, as a member of that committee, that the committee has refused to report that joint resolution back to the Senate as it came from the House; that the committee has amended that joint resolution on motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW]; that the committee then by a vote of yeas and nays refused to report that joint resolution back to this Senate as amended, either favorably or unfavorably, and I defy any member of that committee to suggest how it is possible for that committee ever to bring back to the Senate that joint resolution, unamended or amended, either adversely or favorably. I wait for the chairman of the committee, I wait for any member of the committee, to suggest within the realm of possibility how that joint resolution can ever come back into this Senate Chamber, unless the Senate shall discharge the committee from its further consideration.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I am myself in favor of a bill, which I had the honor to introduce, providing that after a certain number of ballots in the State legislature there shall be an election by a plurality. That, in my judgment—deferring to the judgment of other gentlemen—would remove the chief popular dissatisfaction with the present arrangement, and that is that it creates deadlocks and the election goes over. That was the last pending matter before the committee, and they have not yet acted upon that.

Some members of the committee had some doubt about its constitutionality, but in the case of one member who had such a doubt I think the doubt has been removed by further reflection. That was called up and pending when the committee adjourned some time ago, as I understand. When that is disposed of, then, so far as I know, the whole committee will have formed by a majority an opinion on every one of the solutions of this question, and a majority of the committee will be ready to advise the Senate whether they ought to pass the House joint resolution, or the majority of the committee will be ready to advise the Senate whether they ought to pass that bill, or the majority of the committee will be ready to advise the Senate whether if the House joint resolution is passed, it should be passed with the amendment of the Senator from New York.

A majority of the committee will be ready to advise the Senate whether, amending it as the Senator from New York proposes, still it should be passed or be defeated. In other words, you will have the opinion of the committee on every possible phase of this question.

The committee has devoted a great many sessions and a good deal of anxious thought to this matter. Some people think it is one of the gravest questions which has come up since the beginning of the Government. Others think it of less importance, although everybody agrees it is a very grave question.

Now, the motion to discharge the committee will take it out of the hands of the committee when one of the most essential matters connected with it is still undisposed of there. I have no doubt myself that when that is disposed of there the committee will be prepared, as I have said, to give the Senate its opinion on every phase of this question. I have never known the Senate to discharge a committee under such circumstances.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I doubt if the Senator from Massachusetts in his long and honorable experience here ever before knew a committee to get into just such a fix.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. That is because the committee do not in every respect take my advice. If they did they would not get into such a fix. But I find that thing happens pretty often nowadays.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am perfectly willing to accept the Senator's explanation, but nevertheless the fact remains that this committee is in an anomalous condition; in an awkward predicament. It is in very much the same fix that the teamster was who got stalled driving his wagon down hill. He could neither unload nor back out. That is about the shape the Committee on Privileges and Elections is in now.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow me once more, that is one of the troubles of the committee. When we get to dealing with this question the Senator from Kentucky tells us a delightful anecdote of this kind which takes up our attention and distracts us. That is one of the causes of delay.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Nevertheless the committee has not been sufficiently distracted to prevent it from reaching a fix where it can not help itself, and if it is ever to be gotten out of its predicament the Senate must do it by the Cæsarian process. The Senator from Massachusetts will admit that the bill to which he has alluded, and which he tells the Senate is yet pending before the committee, and which he thinks when disposed of will solve all of this difficulty and relieve us from this embarrassment, has no earthly bearing upon and no earthly connection with the question of electing Senators by direct vote of the people.

The bill to which the Senator alludes, but the nature of which he fails to tell the Senate, is a bill that provides for a plurality election of a Senator by the legislatures of the several States after a certain number of ballots. That is all that it does. It does not touch the question as to whether the Senator shall be elected by direct vote of the people or by the intermediary process of a legislature. So whether that bill which the Senator has pending on reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections shall be approved or disapproved will not in the slightest degree nor in the remotest shape touch the issue which the joint resolution presents.

I repeat, the Senate shall have fair warning from at least one member of the committee. The situation there is conclusive. That joint resolution never can come out of the committee room and never will come out of it unless the Senate takes it out by discharging the committee from its further consideration. It has been elaborately discussed for weeks and months. Week after week no attention was given by the committee to any subject except the joint resolution.

The Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW] introduced an amendment and spoke upon it at length in this Chamber. The amendment was elaborately debated in the committee room. It was adopted by a majority of the committee, and after that, by a yea-and-nay vote, the committee refused to bring the House joint resolution back here, either with a favorable or an adverse report, either as the joint resolution came from the House or as it had been amended in committee on the motion of the New York Senator. I submit in common candor—we had as well call things by their proper names—that any effort to keep the joint resolution in the hands of the committee any longer, in the face of this record, is simply an affidavit for a continuance. It is nothing more and nothing less.

The resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts does nothing except to direct the committee to do what it has already tried to do, namely, to amend the joint resolution in such shape and such form as that it will be able to bring it back here and offer it to the Senate and recommend its adoption. It is an open secret—the Senator from Massachusetts knows it and every other member of the committee knows it—that you can not so amend the joint resolution, it is not within the compass of human ingenuity so to amend it, as to induce a majority of the committee to recommend it favorably to the Senate. Nor have the opponents of the joint resolution been able in all these weeks and all these months so to amend the joint resolution as to induce the committee to report it back even unfavorably. It will not give the Senate an opportunity to vote upon it, and a majority of the committee never intend to give the Senate an opportunity to vote upon it.

Whether I fail or whether I succeed, I never intend whilst I am a member of the United States Senate to desist from the effort to force a vote upon this question. At the hour of 2 o'clock it will go to the Calendar. That will not help you. A motion to take it from the Calendar can be renewed every day during the remainder of this and all succeeding sessions, and it will be made and it will be continued to be made at frequently recurring intervals until the Senate of the United States shall have a chance to vote upon the question of the election of Senators by a vote of the people.

Mr. STEWART. We can vote to take it up, can we not?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not want any debate. I want a vote.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator that I do not think there is any disposition to run this matter by the hour of 2 o'clock. I think we are entirely ready to take a vote now.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let us take it. Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. STEWART. Let us vote.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw that for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, perhaps I ought to state that in addition to the matter stated by the senior Senator from Massachusetts as pending before the committee upon the subject of the election of Senators, I had the honor of introducing at the opening of this Congress a proposed amendment, providing for the election of Senators by the people where the legislature failed to make a choice. It is now well understood under the settled policy of the Senate that when the legislature adjourns without making a choice of Senator the executive of the State can not appoint. The amendment proposed was that where a legislature failed to elect, then the executive of the State should call a popular election for Senator. That proposition is pending before the committee and has not yet been considered. So it will be observed that this whole subject, in many phases, is before the committee, and it is possible we will reach some conclusion.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee one question. I understand it is said that the committee has refused or declined by vote to report back either the House joint resolution or the House joint resolution as amended upon the motion of the Senator from New York. I do not know under what other circumstances. I wish to inquire whether, at the time there was a vote not to report back the joint resolution to the Senate, there were pending the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts and the proposition of the Senator from Michigan, the chairman of the committee, to which he has just alluded? If so, it seems to me it was quite proper to refuse to report back the joint resolution.

Mr. BURROWS. In reply to the Senator from Connecticut, I will state that both propositions were then pending before the committee. The proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts had been, I believe, partially considered, but its consideration had not been concluded, and the proposition to which I refer had not been considered. It is still pending before the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate more than a moment. As I understand the parliamentary status, it is simply this: The affirmative of this motion would bring the House joint resolution to the Senate without any of the amendments which have been considered by the committee and without that amendment which the committee have actually adopted. But that will not improve the situation when the original House joint resolution is brought back from the committee to the Senate, because the friends of that amendment, objectionable to us and the adoption of which prevented a report of the original joint resolution by the committee, will present it here, and it will be adopted in the Senate precisely as it was adopted in the committee. The peculiar situation is this——

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me for one moment?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I do not think the Senator can say that a majority of the Senate will vote for the amendment simply because a majority of the committee did.

Mr. BAILEY. I venture the prophecy, and I think it will be fulfilled.

The peculiar situation in the Senate, as well as in the committee—and to committee transactions I shall not again refer—is this: There is a respectable number of gentlemen in the Senate who are opposed to any change in the present method of selecting Senators. There is another section of Senators who, agreeing to the change, insist upon coupling with it a change as to the power of determining the qualifications of electors. Now, when what is known as the Depew amendment is proposed, the first section of Senators, who are opposed to any change, join with the second section of Senators, who are willing to have a change upon the condition of another change, and they adopt the Depew amendment. Then when the question recurs on the joint resolution as amended, every Senator on this side of the Chamber joins with you Senators on the other side who are opposed to any change at all and the joint resolution will be voted down.

In my judgment that is exactly what will happen. I may add, believing that that would happen, perhaps as a matter of wisdom I would vote against occupying the time of the Senate by bringing the joint resolution here. Still, I am a member of the committee, and perhaps I have some delicacy in insisting upon holding in the committee a joint resolution which the Senate desires to consider. But further, while I ventured my prophecy, I am going to assume that I may be mistaken and that the Senator from Arkansas may be right, and that it is possible the Depew amendment might be voted down and the original House joint resolution adopted. Upon that bare hope—it is not more than a bare one—I intend to vote to discharge the committee. But at the same time neither now nor hereafter, nor at any time, will I ever vote to change the method of electing Senators when I must couple with it a surrender of the power now possessed by the States to determine the qualifications of their electors.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I also am a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I wish to confirm the statements which have been made here as to the industrious and sincere way in which the committee has labored to reach a conclusion in regard to this general proposition.

In view of what the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has said, I wish to say that I favored reporting the House joint resolution to the Senate as amended by the adoption of the Depew amendment, as it is called. That, however, did not prevail, and now we are confronted with the question whether or not the committee shall be discharged, and, I suppose, whether or not the Senate shall then take up this question and deal with it. I doubt whether we will remedy the situation by discharging the committee. But this is one of the questions which it seems will not down, and the Senator from Kentucky has told us that he intends to renew this motion and press it upon the Senate at every opportunity—every day, during the morning hour—until in some manner we have a chance to vote upon the question whether or not the people are to be allowed to vote in the election of United States Senators.

In view of all this, although doubting the wisdom of changing the present plan of electing Senators, I have concluded to vote in favor of discharging the committee, with the understanding that we shall then take up this question and settle it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is right.

Mr. FORAKER. I propose, if the Senator from New York is not here to offer his amendment, to offer it in his absence, unless some other Senator will kindly do so. I will do that. I will say to Senators on the Democratic side, in good faith, in order that, if it is to be a question whether or not Senators shall be elected by a vote of the people, we may make sure that the people have a right to vote. Therefore I shall vote to discharge the committee. Then I shall vote to immediately consider the joint resolution. I shall thereupon offer an amendment, and then I shall have something to say about it, perhaps, if I think it necessary.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. President, as a member of the committee, in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Kentucky, which was whether any member of the committee thought it likely or possible that the committee could agree on any report upon this proposition, I wish to express the opinion that there is far more likely to be an agreement by the committee upon a proposition to be reported to the Senate than there is likely to be any outcome of discussion in the Senate at this time.

I think the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has clearly outlined the situation. A number of Senators are opposed to any change. A number desire a change, so that the people may elect Senators, not making sure what people, or whether some or all of the people may elect Senators. Another body of Senators feel that if a change is to be made and the people are to elect Senators, the election should be made by all the people, and that that can only be made certain when the registration, conduct of elections, and certification of the result, by the people in their elections, are made plain and secure.

It seems to me, without disclosing the vote in the committee, that there is such a narrowness of difference that in further efforts there may be some conclusion, and that conclusion may be brought to the Senate far quicker than the Senate itself could arrive at any conclusion. As has been said by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Texas, precisely the same question that is involved in the committee will arise here. The same attitude may bring the same result. It is agreed on both sides of the Chamber that there has been diligence in endeavoring to dispose of the joint resolution of the House. I apprehend that the chairman of the committee and other members of the committee will agree with me that there is far more likelihood of a conclusion in favor of one view or of another coming from the committee, if it be not discharged, than there is likelihood that the Senate can do as well as the committee has thus far done.

It may be said that the committee has not succeeded in doing anything. The Senate will perhaps be further from doing anything, and it had better come in some shape from the committee. Therefore I shall vote not to discharge the committee, but with the expectation that the committee may bring some conclusion for the consideration of the Senate, I shall vote that it shall proceed as committees do and should with the consideration of the joint resolution now pending before it.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator from Maryland allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. Do I understand the Senator to say that he is a member of the committee?

Mr. McCOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MASON. How long has the committee had the joint resolution under consideration?

Mr. McCOMAS. It has been under consideration for weeks.

Mr. BERRY. Six months, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. MASON. The suggestion which the Senator from Maryland now makes is that the committee be permitted further to consider it.

Mr. McCOMAS. I think the Senate, if it considers the proposition as it will appear here, will probably consider it a very long time. I think the most likely way to have it disposed of is to let the committee, which by a narrow margin may bring a result, bring it to the Senate.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate for any length of time on this question. I am as anxious as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] can possibly be to have a square vote upon the issue as presented by the House joint resolution.

I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from New York and opposed to the joint resolution as it comes from the House. I have been a member of the Democratic party, if I may be permitted to make a personal remark, for nearly fifty years. If I have ever refused to vote for a candidate of that party, from the highest to the lowest office, I do not now remember it. The two last conventions of the Democratic party have declared in favor of the election of United States Senators by the people.

I am so unfortunate as to be unable to agree with those conventions upon that question. I deny the right of any convention, State or national, to control my action as a Senator of the United States. I do not believe that the evils of which complaint is now made will be remedied or removed by a change in the form of electing Senators to this body. I do not believe you can purify the fountain by changing the form of the stream that comes from it. When the time comes in this country that the people must be protected from their own corruption, their own ignorance, their own imbecility, it is a publication to the entire world that the theory of our Government is a failure and that the people are not capable of self-government.

We are told that the object of the joint resolution is to remove the facility with which corruption may be used in the election of Senators. Mr. President, my observation and experience teach me that where corruption can be used corrupt men will always find a way to use it. What will be the result if the joint resolution is adopted as it comes from the House? Every intelligent man in this country knows that the candidates for United States Senators in the respective States will be nominated by conventions, and every intelligent man knows how easily conventions will be influenced by improper means to make nominations which the party represented in the convention will deem it their duty to support.

We are told that to-day multimillionaires can buy legislatures. Who pretends to say that they can not, especially in the large cities, buy the votes, by hundreds and thousands, of the men who will by direct vote elect United States Senators? Who pretends to say that this body of United States Senators, 90 in number, is not equal in integrity, in intelligence, in all the great qualities of a representative capacity to the governors of the respective States? Who does not know that the governors consider it a promotion to come from their executive office to this body? Are the governors more honest, more intelligent, more fit to represent the people than the Senate as assembled here? Who says it?

Mr. President, those governors are elected by direct vote of the people. And yet we are told that if we change the form of election we get rid of the impurity at the very source of all legislative power. Sir, it reminds me—I am a Western man and use Western illustrations—of the countryman who on a hot day was carrying himself and a bag of corn to the country mill. He saw that his horse was laboring under the heat and burden imposed upon him, and in order to relieve the animal he got off, took the bag of corn upon his own shoulder, got back upon the horse, and congratulated himself that he had found a remedy. [Laughter.] Who believes that if you change the form of election you get rid of the great motive power, the people, who, if corrupt themselves, will surely make that fact manifest in the result of any election?

But, Mr. President, above all this, I am opposed, irrevocably opposed, to this change in our constitutional law because it destroys what I consider one of the most valuable features of the Federal Constitution, adopted in 1789.

A compromise was made in the Constitutional Convention upon this, as upon every other question. The smaller States insisted upon the election of two Senators by every State without regard to numerical population. The larger States insisted that the power to inaugurate revenue bills should be in the House of Representatives. A compromise was effected by which the smaller States received two Senators, and the Senate represents the State-rights feature of the Constitution. The House of Representatives represents the popular feature. Upon this compromise that great instrument, the Constitution of the United States, was made.

What do you propose to do now? Instead of two legislative bodies, one representing the people at large, the other representing the conservative and deliberate judgment of Senators not holding office for two years, but holding it for six years, and who are assumed to represent the States in their sovereign capacity, we are to have one great House of Representatives, two bodies sitting separately, but both in reality what the popular branch of the Congress is to-day.

What do you invite by such a change? You invite immediately the suggestion on the part of the larger States that if enumeration according to the people is to be adopted it shall apply in the Senate as well as in the House. More than this, you invite contested elections as we see them now at the other end of the Capitol. You will find every Senator's place here, if that place becomes important for political success, dependent upon a contest in any or every township. The whole form of the Government is changed and the basis upon which the Constitution was adopted is given up under the claim that if the people were permitted to elect directly the election would be more pure than under the present system.

Now, Mr. President, I will simply say that all this issue is a plan adopted by adroit politicians, in my opinion, who desire to make the impression upon the people that they are better and purer and more competent to choose Senators than the men whom they may elect through a general assembly or legislature of the State.

I should like for some Senator to tell me how the people of a county or an election district can know better the qualifications for the high office of a United States Senator of a multimillionaire whom they have never seen, and whose name is put before them by a convention they never attended, than they can pass upon the qualifications of a member of the legislature.

How can they better know as to the qualification of such a candidate than one of their own neighbors, with whom they have lived for years, with whose antecedents they are familiar, and whom they know to be honest, intelligent, and acquainted with their interests? But we are told that the question of the election of the multimillionaire with his millions of dollars, utterly unknown to the people, is to be passed upon by them in preference to this neighbor, whom they have known for half a century.

I repeat, Mr. President, if the fountain is impure the stream will be impure. You can not evade this issue by the form of the election.

I could go into many more arguments against this terrible innovation. I belong, possibly, to a past school in public life. I believe the Constitution should be approached anxiously, carefully, and every aspect of every change should be duly and fairly considered. I believe the men who made the Constitution—in which supreme power exists nowhere except with the people—prescribed the form to be adopted when that great instrument was to be amended, in order to avoid this desire on the part of the demagogues to achieve their own purposes by flattering the people.

I ask the Secretary to read some extracts I have made from the debates in the Convention of 1787, giving the reasons for this clause in the Constitution. I have here the opinion of James Madison, who represented one school, and of Alexander Hamilton, who represented the other.

It has been said by leading members of the Democratic party, to which I belong, that Mr. Jefferson favored the election of Senators by the people. I claim to be familiar with his writings, and he seldom spoke. There are expressions in some of his letters to his intimate friends, wherein he desired an extreme popular or democratic government, but Mr. Jefferson nowhere at any time declared that Senators of the United States should be elected by the people and not by the legislatures.

I will ask the Secretary to read what I send to the desk, and I shall not detain the Senator any longer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. Madison says:

"It is unnecessary to dilate upon the appointment of Senators by the State legislatures. Among the various modes which might have been devised for constituting this branch of the Government that which has been proposed by the convention is probably the most congenial to public opinion. It is recommended by the double advantage of favoring a select appointment and of giving to the State governments such agency in the formation of the Federal Government as must secure the authority of the former and may form a convenient link between the two systems."

Madison further says:

"In a republican government the legislative authority necessarily predominates. The remedy is to divide the legislature into different branches and to render them, by different modes of election and different principles of action, as little connected with each other as the nature of their common functions and common dependence on society will admit."

Mr. Hamilton says:

"So far as the mode of formation may expose the union to the possibility of injury from the State legislatures, it is an evil, but it is an evil which can not be avoided without excluding the States in their political capacities wholly from a place in the organization of the National Government. If it had been done, it would doubtless have been interpreted into an entire dereliction of the Federal principle, and would certainly have deprived the State governments of that absolute safeguard which they will enjoy under this provision."

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I simply want to make one statement in explanation, to be added to my remarks. I said the last two Democratic national conventions had indorsed the election of United States Senators by the people directly. My friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who was a member of the committee on resolutions at Chicago——

Mr. BAILEY. No; I was not a member.

Mr. VEST. I thought you were. At any rate, he was a member of the convention, like myself. I was under the impression that the platform at Chicago included this statement, but he tells me I am mistaken, and therefore I withdraw that.

I wish to make one other statement. A friend suggests to me that 2 o'clock is about to approach and the vote can not be taken, while if I had not spoken it could have been taken. I sincerely hope that the Senate will take it, and I shall make a motion to postpone the regular order in order that the vote may be taken upon discharging the committee from the further consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BERRY. We will take the vote right now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON], to discharge the Committee on Privileges and Elections from the further consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BERRY. On that question let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], but knowing his views on this question, I take the liberty of voting. I vote "yea."

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HOAR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS]; but as he agrees with me on this subject, my pair has been transferred, and I vote "nay."

Mr. KEARNS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. GIBSON]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], and vote "nay."

Mr. MCENERY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. DEPEW], and withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. MALLORY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAPP (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]; but as he would vote as I do on this question, I am at liberty to vote. I understand that the junior Senator from North Carolina is paired with his colleague [Mr. PRITCHARD] on this question.

Mr. SPOONER. My colleague [Mr. QUARLES] is absent in the discharge of public duties as a member of one of the Senate committees.

Mr. TURNER. I wish to inquire if the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. TURNER. I have a general pair with that Senator. As he is not present, I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Montana (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE]. As he is not present, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. DANIEL. I am paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 35; as follows:

CUBAN RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES.

Mr. CULBERSON. I offer a resolution of inquiry and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolution will be read to the Senate.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a full, itemized statement of all moneys collected and disbursed by the authorities of the United States in Cuba from the military occupation thereof until May 20, 1902.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I ask that the resolution may be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. When was it introduced?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was just introduced with the request that it be considered now.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think it had better lie over one day, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the resolution goes over.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to state the reason. A portion of these expenses, up to a certain date, have been reported to the committee. I am under the impression that from that date up to the present time they could be sent here by the Secretary of War without any great delay, but it would make a very voluminous document, covering several volumes, and whether it can be done now and how much time would be required I do not know. I should like to inquire about it during the day.

AGREEMENT WITH CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business,

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to me that I may make a request?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will yield for morning business.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Choctaw treaty bill was passed be taken up immediately after the morning business to-morrow morning.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Choctaw treaty bill was passed may be taken up immediately after the morning business to-morrow morning.

Mr. NELSON. I object to that. That time is given to the London dock clause bill.

Mr. STEWART. Is all the time going to be taken up by that bill?

Mr. NELSON. No; not all the time. I have given away this week to the naval appropriation bill, and I gave way to the matter which occupied the Senate this morning. I am entitled to have the time to-morrow morning.

Mr. STEWART. I do not understand that a unanimous-consent agreement extends clear through the whole session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. STEWART. I will inquire if the unanimous-consent agreement for the consideration of a bill can extend indefinitely during the whole session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It did extend indefinitely in the case proposed by the Senator from Minnesota until the final disposition of the bill, not to conflict with almost everything else, however.

Mr. STEWART. It ought not to conflict with necessary business, such as treaties and the like, and formal business of the morning hour.

Mr. NELSON. I think the bill will be disposed of to-morrow.

Mr. STEWART. I hope so. I think I shall move to lay it on the table if it is not disposed of.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13676) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. BURROWS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. WARREN, Mr. PROCTOR, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 14111) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River, in the State of Tennessee, by the Harriman Southern Railroad Company; and

A bill (H. R. 14691) to authorize the construction of a pontoon bridge across the Missouri River, in the county of Cass, in the State of Nebraska, and in the county of Mills, in the State of Iowa.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, we face a great undertaking, which completed will vitally affect the commerce of the United States and of the world. A new highway is to be established, through which a mighty commerce will pass during the centuries before us. It is an axiom of trade that commerce follows lines of least resistance, and when the narrow barrier dividing the great oceans is cut commerce will pass through it in constantly increasing volume between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States and our territory in the seas, and between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of our neighbors in North and South America, and between the ports of the other countries of the world.

Years of discussion and futile effort to unite the two oceans lie back of us. Perhaps I should not say futile, as what has been so long attempted has served to accentuate the necessity of the work and point the way at last to its accomplishment. The task thus far has baffled statesmanship, defied individual and corporate enterprise, and challenged the wealth and power of governments. For nearly four centuries an isthmian canal has been the dream of statesmen and the hope of commerce. For quite seventy-five years the attention of the United States has been directed to the subject more or less sharply and with more or less frequency. But not until now, at the morning of the new century, has a government been able and strong enough and willing to speak the decisive word and to resolutely set about the hitherto almost impossible task.

More than fifty years ago the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was entered into between the United States and Great Britain, whereby the joint control of an isthmian canal was established. The State Department and the records of Congress bear abundant testimony that this treaty defeated its own purpose and brought friction between the two great English-speaking powers. The treaty contained no terms by which it could be terminated by either Government. Whether changed conditions and alleged breaches of some of the conditions by either party worked its abrogation has long been a debatable question. I have been of those who believed that the treaty was not abrogated, but was a subsisting convention, and that it should be respected as such until modified or abrogated, or superseded by a new treaty.

President McKinley, through his accomplished Secretary of State, John Hay, undertook to secure a modification or supersession of the treaty, and it is to their credit that we have confirmed and exchanged a treaty under which one of the most notable undertakings in the history of the world is to be accomplished. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty is a great achievement—a conspicuous tribute to our national self-restraint, our national honor, and to American diplomacy.

Under it we may construct, maintain, and operate an isthmian canal under the distinct authority of the United States. Its neutralization invites the commerce of the world, and all countries are concerned in its perpetual preservation. There will stand against our record now no taint or suggestion of national bad faith, and this work, which shall carry the commerce of the world long after the pyramids are resolved into dust, will proclaim both the honor and good faith of the United States.

It looked for a time as though the demands of trade were so acute and impetuous that they would sweep away the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by ex parte action; but while we were anxious to build the canal, we were more anxious to preserve inviolate our national good faith, and to not build it upon a foundation of broken covenants or upon ex parte renunciation.

The United States does not underrate the magnitude of the work. Her resources are entirely adequate. She asks no aid of any power—and is ready to carry the enterprise to its consummation, and hold it perpetually for the commerce of the world, and upon terms of absolute equality.

For many years this enterprise has been sanctioned by the judgment of the American people, except possibly a few of those who felt that the commerce between our Atlantic and Pacific ports might be diverted from the transcontinental rails and to their prejudice. I am disposed to believe that such opposition has been unduly exaggerated, for those who have been charged with such a narrow view must, upon maturer reflection, have perceived compensating benefits in the more rapid and larger upbuilding and increase in wealth and power of our seaboard cities and the country back of them.

The approval of the project by the people has found expression for years in the platforms of the various political parties, and no party has desired or dared to make an issue upon the subject. Influential commercial bodies and the press have spoken forcibly and with remarkable unanimity in its favor.

Granted the necessity and the wisdom of the construction of an Isthmian canal, it becomes essential that the most available route should be determined.

Congress, appreciating the magnitude of the undertaking and feeling that it was insufficiently advised as to the most feasible route and its probable cost, authorized the President, by the river and harbor bill approved March 3, 1899, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States of America be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to make full and complete investigation of the Isthmus of Panama with a view to the construction of a canal by the United States across the same to connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans; that the President is authorized to make investigation of any and all practicable routes for a canal across said Isthmus of Panama, and particularly to investigate the two routes known, respectively, as the Nicaragua route and the Panama route, with a view to determining the most practicable and feasible route for such canal, together with the proximate and probable cost of constructing a canal at each of two or more of said routes; and the President is further authorized to investigate and ascertain what rights, privileges, and franchises, if any, may be held and owned by any corporations, associations, or individuals, and what work, if any, has been done by such corporations, associations, or individuals in the construction of a canal at either or any of said routes, and particularly at the so-called Nicaraguan and Panama routes, respectively; and likewise to ascertain the cost of purchasing all of the rights, privileges, and franchises held and owned by any such corporations, associations, and individuals in any and all of such routes, particularly the said Nicaraguan route and the said Panama route, and likewise to ascertain the probable or proximate cost of constructing a suitable harbor at each of the termini of said canal, with the probable annual cost of maintenance of said harbors, respectively. And generally the President is authorized to make such full and complete investigation as to determine the most feasible and practicable route across said Isthmus for a canal, together with the cost of constructing the same and placing the same under the control, management, and ownership of the United States.

He was authorized to employ the necessary persons to accomplish the purpose in view, and a million dollars was appropriated and put at his disposal.

Mr. MORGAN. Would the Senator object to reading the last clause of that act?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Not at all. I will read it entire. I have just read section 3.

SEC. 4. To enable the President to make the investigations and ascertainments herein provided for, he is hereby authorized to employ in said service any of the engineers of the United States Army at his discretion, and likewise to employ any engineers in civil life, at his discretion, and any other persons necessary to make such investigation, and to fix the compensation of any and all of such engineers and other persons.

SEC. 5. For the purpose of defraying the expenses necessary to be incurred in making the investigations herein provided for, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be disbursed by order of the President.

SEC. 6. That the President is hereby requested to report to Congress the results of such investigations, together with his recommendations in the premises.

Does that cover what the Senator desires?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, the scope of the inquiry was properly made broad and comprehensive, and the several matters to be investigated and reported upon were distinctly and specifically stated, and were such as were imperatively necessary to enable the Congress to arrive at a rational and satisfactory conclusion. They were such as the Congress should be fully advised about before it should take up for consideration and final action a subject of such magnitude and far-reaching importance as the one which now engages our attention.

Prior to this action of the Congress our minds had largely been confined to the Nicaraguan route. It seemed to be generally accepted as a fact that in the construction of an Isthmian canal that route was the one to be adopted. Public opinion had long been focused upon it. This was not due to any careful study of the comparative merits of the respective routes, but rather to the fact that the Nicaraguan route had been exploited by American companies, while the Panama route had been under the control of the French. Political conventions of all parties for many years had favored the Nicaraguan route, but that the people had any preference, except upon lines of superior availability, there can be no doubt.

The Republican national convention of 1896 declared in favor of the Nicaraguan route. Subsequently the Isthmian Canal Commission was created, and it seemed advisable that the vital subject of location should be more carefully considered, so the Republican national convention of 1900 declared in favor of the construction of an isthmian canal, but not in favor of any specific route. It was regarded as unwise, in view of the vast importance of the undertaking and of our partial information, to commit the Government blindly to any fixed line. It was deemed the part of conservative wisdom to leave entirely open the subject of permanent location until all available or ascertainable facts were secured and weighed by those having expert and scientific knowledge; for it is obvious that the subject is one peculiarly within the province of those who have given to the construction of great undertakings critical study, and who from long practical experience are able to weigh the merits and demerits, the advantages and disadvantages of the various routes. In fact, but few have given to the subject that intelligent and careful attention which its importance justifies.

The Congress had no pet scheme to advance; it was not to be governed by any purely sentimental considerations. It wanted to know but one thing, and that was which route, all things considered, was the most feasible and practicable. It was provided, therefore, that the Commission should not be limited in its investigation, but should give its attention to all routes worthy of consideration.

The President, agreeably to the provisions of the law, appointed a Commission, known as the Walker Commission, composed of men well fitted by education and experience to examine exhaustively the subject in its historic, scientific, economic, and practical features.

The Commission possessed in an especial degree the public confidence. It would have been difficult if not impossible to select men better fitted in all respects for the important work. They had but one end to accomplish, and that was to discharge freely, frankly, and fearlessly the high and important trust committed to them. They knew that their report would probably be the basis of Congressional action, and that their work sooner or later would be put to the test.

Let us see for a moment who were the Commissioners: J. G. Walker, rear-admiral of the United States Navy, was the president of the Commission; Samuel Pasco was long a conspicuous and honorable member of the United States Senate, a man learned in the law; Lieut. Col. Oswald H. Ernst and Col. Peter C. Hains came from the Army; Messrs. George S. Morrison, Alfred Noble, William H. Burr, and Lewis M. Haupt were selected from the list of eminent civil engineers; Emory R. Johnson, professor of transportation and commerce of the University of Pennsylvania, was added because of his conspicuous attainments. Four members of the Commission, Messrs. Walker, Hains, Noble, and Haupt, had served on a previous Commission created by the Congress.

The Commission critically examined the leading canals of the world; it conducted and caused to be conducted, through competent engineers, careful investigations into the local physical conditions along the several proposed routes, and we can not assume that it has failed to conscientiously, thoroughly, and intelligently discharge its important functions. It was engaged in its delicate and important work nearly two and one-half years.

The result of its investigations and deliberations is before the Senate in the form of two reports, very minute and comprehensive upon all aspects of the subject. We have before us in brief compass the complete history of all attempts to construct an isthmian canal, and an undivided opinion as to the most feasible route to be chosen, with an estimate of its probable cost.

The Commission, in its first report, after considering and weighing the respective merits of the various routes that have engaged attention from time to time, dismisses as impracticable all except the Panama and Nicaragua routes, and concludes that in view of the price fixed by the Panama Canal Company for the sale of its property, that "the most practicable and feasible route 'for an isthmian canal, to be' under the control, management, and ownership of the United States, is that known as the Nicaragua route."

The Commission discussed elaborately and with great detail the history of interoceanic projects and communications; the dimensions and unit prices; other possible routes; the Panama route; the Nicaragua route; earthquakes, volcanoes, climate, health; rights, privileges, and franchises; industrial and commercial value of the canal; military value and cost of maintenance and operation. Their report embraces 263 printed pages and is before us. No fact or feature essential for our consideration has been omitted. In concluding its report the Commission directs attention to the superior advantages of the Panama route, clearly showing that while it reported in favor of the Nicaragua route, its strong preference was the Panama route so far as purely physical conditions were concerned.

There are certain physical advantages—

Said the Commission—

such as a shorter canal line, a more complete knowledge of the country through which it passes, and lower cost of maintenance and operation in favor of the Panama route, but the price fixed by the Panama Canal Company for a sale of its property and franchises is so unreasonable that its acceptance can not be recommended by this Commission.

This indicates most conclusively that the suggestion which has been made that the second report of the Commission in favor of the Panama route is an afterthought, or that the Commission has without proper consideration abandoned the Nicaraguan route for another, is not well founded.

The report was made to the President November 16, 1901. It appears from it that the Commission had solicited of the New Panama Canal Company a price at which the canal could be purchased. The sum named was equivalent to $109,141,500 and was deemed exorbitant. The Commission estimated the value of the property of the company which might be utilized by the United States at only $40,000,000. After the submission of the report the Canal Company offered to sell its rights, property, and unfinished work to the United States for the sum of $40,000,000, the value put upon it by our own Commission.

This materially changed the aspect of affairs. The Commission was reconvened and resumed consideration of the subject in view of the new offer, and subsequently, on January 18, 1902, reported in favor of the construction of an isthmian canal on the Panama route.

The Commmission frankly and fully stated the reasons which had moved it to depart from the conclusions of its former report. These reasons, it seems to me, assuming the facts stated to be true, abundantly justify the Commission in its final conclusion. The second report is precisely the result which would have been reached in the first report if the canal company originally had not put upon its property an unreasonable price.

The advantage of the two canal routes—have been restated according to the findings of the former report. There has been no change in the views of the Commission with reference to any of these conclusions then reached, but the new proposition submitted by the New Panama Canal Company makes a reduction of nearly $70,000,000 in the cost of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama, according to the estimates contained in the former report, and with this reduction a canal can be there constructed for more than $5,500,000 less than through Nicaragua. The unreasonable sum asked for the property and rights of the New Panama Canal Company when the Commission reached its former conclusion overbalanced the advantages of that route, but now that the estimates by the two routes have been nearly equalized the Commission can form its judgment by weighing the advantages of each and determining which is the more practicable and feasible.

There is, however, one important matter which can not enter into its determination, but which may in the end control the action of the United States. Reference is made to the disposition of the governments whose territory is necessary for the construction and operation of an isthmian canal. It must be assumed by the Commission that Colombia will exercise the same fairness and liberality if the Panama route is determined upon that have been expected of Nicaragua and Costa Rica should the Nicaragua route be preferred.

After considering—

These words are of uncommon weight and of controlling influence—the changed conditions that now exist and all the facts and circumstances upon which its present judgment must be based, the Commission is of the opinion that "the most practicable and feasible route" for an isthmian canal, to be "under the control, management, and ownership of the United States," is that known as the Panama route.

It will thus be observed that the Commission has acted with entire consistency, and the reasons which led it to reconsider and change its recommendation of route are absolutely sound and controlling.

I know of no better light by which we can be guided than the information and opinion of the Commission charged with the grave and solemn responsibility of informing the Congress upon the subject. I was of those who, prior to the authorization of the Commission, felt the absolute inadequacy of the information at hand, and gladly supported the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the creation of it and the ascertainment of the information which has been laid before us.

My predilections and opinions, founded upon fragmentary and unsatisfactory information, were entirely in favor of the Nicaragua route. But if weight is to be given to the opinion of our own impartial commissioners, men of experience and capacity, we must discard the Nicaragua and select the Panama route.

The Commission has given us in much detail the obstacles to be overcome and the relative advantages of the respective routes, together with the relative cost of construction and cost of operation.

The estimated cost of construction of the Nicaragua route is $189,864,062.

The cost of the Panama route is estimated at (including $40,000,000 price of property to be acquired from Panama Canal Company) $184,222,358.

If we had but to consider the relative cost of construction of the two canals thus shown there would be a saving upon the Panama route of substantially $5,500,000. It is suggested that this sum is so small compared with the vast amount involved in the work that it is hardly worthy of consideration. It is perhaps true that it should not be allowed to weigh against mere considerations of feasibility in construction, operation, and maintenance, but inasmuch as it is a saving upon a route deemed by the Commission to be the most practicable and feasible, it is entirely proper to set down to the credit of that route a saving of five and a half millions of dollars.

It will be observed that the Commission has disclosed a very important fact, one which should be distinctly borne in mind, and that is that it will cost $1,300,000 less per annum to operate the Panama than to operate the Nicaragua route. This sum, capitalized on the basis of the interest upon the national bonds, equivalent to 2 per cent, amounts to $65,000,000. Add to this the amount saved in construction and we have a total sum to the credit of the Panama route of $70,500,000.

The all-important question, as I have hitherto said, is to select the proper route, and this must be determined upon no considerations of mere sentiment or favoritism. It is obvious that few among us possess that personal knowledge, that technical skill, to decide unaided this vital question. Who upon this floor is familiar with the physical characteristics of the country, or has personal knowledge of the several contemplated routes? Or who knows the various essential features to be taken into account in the location and consideration of so important a work?

I frankly confess that I have no knowledge whatever upon the subject, except as I have gathered it from the reports of those who have investigated it in all of its bearings and aspects. I go to those who have been upon the ground and applied all of the tests known to science, or which have been suggested by experience, to enable them to form an opinion as to what can be accomplished, and at what cost, and I must accept their best judgment. To blindly disregard such opinion would, it seems to me, be unwise and dangerous in a degree.

It is a fortunate circumstance that we have before us the unanimous report of the Commission. The nine commissioners speak but one voice, and that is in favor of the Panama route. Whose opinion is entitled to more weight than theirs?

The advantages of the Panama route as stated by the Commission were submitted to the Senate a few days ago by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA], but I may be pardoned for restating them in this connection as they are summarized in the report of the minority:

1. It is 134.57 miles shorter than the Nicaragua from sea to sea (being 49.09 miles by Panama as against 183.66 miles by Nicaragua).

2. It has less curvature, both in degrees and miles, being but 22.85 miles of curvature as against 49.29 on the Nicaragua, and but 771 degrees for Panama as against 2,339 degrees for Nicaragua.

3. The actual time of transit is less, being but twelve hours of steaming by Panama, as against a minimum of thirty-three hours of steaming by Nicaragua; that is, of one day of daylight as against three days of daylight (for the canal must be navigated by day exclusively at first, and, to a great extent, always, especially by large ships, which chiefly will use it. The Commission's plan does not provide facilities for navigation by night.)

4. The locks are fewer in number, being but five on the Panama to eight on the Nicaragua.

5. The harbors are better, those at the termini of the Panama being good and already used by the commerce of the world, while at the termini of the Nicaragua there are no harbors whatever.

6. The Panama route traverses a beaten track in civilization, having been in use by the commerce of the world for four centuries, while the Nicaragua route passes through an unsettled and undeveloped wilderness.

7. There already exists on the Panama route a railroad perfect in every respect and equipped in a modern manner, closely following the line of the canal, and thus greatly facilitating the construction of the canal, as well as furnishing a source of revenue, and included in the offer of the Panama company.

8. The annual cost of maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal would be $1,300,000 less than that of the Nicaragua (which sum capitalized is the equivalent of $65,000,000).

9. All engineering and practical questions involved in the construction of the Panama are satisfactorily settled and assured, all the physical conditions are known, and the estimates of the cost reliable, while the Nicaragua involves unknown and uncertain factors in construction and unknown difficulties to be encountered, which greatly increase the risks of construction and render uncertain the maximum cost of completion.

In addition to these facts stated by the Commission are the two following, not referred to by them, but which have become of controlling importance, viz:

10. It is recognized that a sea-level canal is the ideal. The Panama Canal may be either constructed as a sea-level canal or may be subsequently converted into one. On the other hand, no sea-level canal will ever be possible on the Nicaragua route.

11. No volcanoes exist on the line of the Panama Canal nor in its neighborhood. On the other hand, the Nicaragua route traverses an almost continually volcanic tract, which has been during the last three-quarters of a century probably the most violently eruptive in the Western Hemisphere. The active volcanoes, Zapatera and Ometepe, rise actually from the waters of Lake Nicaragua.

12. At Panama earthquakes are few and unimportant, while the Nicaragua route passes over a line of well-known crustal weakness. Only five disturbances of any sort were recorded at Panama during 1901, all very slight, while similar official records at San Jose de Costa Rica, near the route of the Nicaragua Canal, show, for the same period, 50 shocks, a number of which were severe.

13. As a practical matter the masters of vessels prefer the Panama route for safety, convenience, and shortness of transit, for its less curvature and risks, and for the lower insurance rate by that route.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator kindly state from what he has been reading?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I have been reading from the report of the minority of the committee, on pages 10 and 11.

I have said that the reports of the Commission were unanimous. They were, in fact, signed by each member, but since their submission one of the Commissioners appeared before the committee and dissented from the conclusions of the Commission. I quote from his testimony.

Mr. HAUPT. * * * As the question before this committee is largely one of the selection of two routes, I beg leave to say that while conceding to the wishes of the majority and signing a report in order to make it unanimous, and so, if possible, to secure legislation at this session, I still feel and did then that there were certain economic, physical, engineering, sanitary, and commercial advantages inherent to the Nicaragua route which gave it a decided preference over the Panama route.

This extraordinary admission should eliminate Mr. Haupt from further consideration in connection with the subject of the canal. The Congress wished for the frank and unbiased opinion of the commissioners, but by the admission of this officer he deliberately signed a report stating essential facts and conclusions to be true which, according to his present testimony, were not true and well founded. By his admission he is a discredited witness. Which shall we accept? The opinion he solemnly expressed in the report of the Commission, or the opposite conclusion which he submitted to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals? We shall not pause to consider whether he was right when acting with the Commission, or when he testified before the committee. We have not time to reconcile his conflicting views. His opinions and testimony should be dismissed as unworthy of credence.

It is asserted, with much apparent confidence, that it is impossible for the United States to secure an absolute, clear title to the property of the New Panama Canal Company, and that if we acquired the property we would take it subject to innumerable demands of stockholders and creditors, and that we would find ourselves involved in vast and inextricable confusion and legal difficulties.

From such examination as I have been able to make, I do not think that the contention is well founded and believe that the United States will take the property, if it shall purchase it, free and clear of all demands of stockholders and creditors, and that it will not rest under any legal, equitable, or moral obligation to pay one dollar beyond the $40,000,000, the price asked by the Canal Company.

It will profit little to go into the long, legal history and all the details of the original Panama Canal Company, and of the company now owning the property. Reference to a few salient features will suffice. The Compagnie Universelle du Canal Interocéanique, known as the "old company," was incorporated under the laws of France and undertook the construction of the Panama Canal. It obtained and held proper concessions from the Government of Colombia. The company was organized and the work of construction was begun by Ferdinand de Lesseps, who was then at the zenith of his power, and the civilized world looked forward with confidence to the early consummation of the great and long-delayed undertaking. But the enterprise was fated, the corporation became insolvent, and by the close of 1888 proceedings were taken in a French court having jurisdiction for its dissolution. The court, upon proper hearing, by a decree passed February 4, 1889, "found the company to be insolvent, pronounced its dissolution, and appointed" a liquidator, an officer of the court corresponding to a receiver in the courts of the United States. The liquidator became the custodian of all the property of the insolvent company. The old enterprise was dead and the court was obliged to administer upon the assets of the company. It was the duty of the liquidator to marshal and distribute the assets among the creditors and stockholders of the corporation under the authority and direction of the court. The court appointing the liquidator invested him "with the broadest powers, especially to grant or contribute to any new company all or part of the corporate assets."

Under the concession from the Government of Colombia the old company, because of its insolvency and inability to complete the canal, was sure to forfeit valuable concessions. Substantially all of the building materials, works, improvements, and other assets of the canal company would be forfeited and lost, unless some arrangement could be made with a new company to take up and prosecute the unfinished work.

The liquidator secured an extension of its contract with the Colombian Government in 1890 for a period of ten years.

It was provided in the original extension that the concessionary should transfer the plant of the company in liquidation to a new company, which should undertake to complete the canal. It was further provided that the new company should be organized with sufficient capital for the purpose and should resume the work not later than February 28, 1893. This condition not having been fulfilled, a further extension was secured until October 31, 1894.

The payments exacted by Colombia for the extensions were duly and properly made by the new company.

Before the new company was organized the Parliament of France passed a special act to control the closing up of the affairs of the old company. The act was passed July 1, 1893.

It specially provided that the transfer or contribution of the corporate assets by the liquidator should be subject to confirmation in open court.

A new company was organized in 1894 and the assets of the old company were duly transferred to it by the liquidator. Opportunity was given the intervenors to interpose objections, objections were made and overruled, and the decree of the court ratifying the action of the liquidator was made final. Under the sale to the new company, it was provided, among other things, that the liquidator should receive 60 per cent of the net profits of the new company.

It was well understood that the only hope of saving anything to the creditors was by reorganizing the enterprise and inducing the investment of new capital. If work which had been stopped was not resumed and prosecuted, all that had been done would be forfeited and would become utterly valueless.

Will it be maintained that the court which had the power to direct the liquidator to make the contract under which existing property might be saved for the cestui qui trust has no power to authorize a modification of it when such property was again in peril, so that what remained might still be preserved? No one fails to see that the new enterprise is a failure, and unless a sale is effected the liquidator will realize little or nothing upon the reserved profit of 60 per cent.

The French court has taken action in the matter of the proposed sale upon a petition duly exhibited by the liquidator. This officer asked leave of the court to make an agreement with the new company concerning—

First. The determination of the price and the conditions to be proposed to the eventual purchaser.

Second. The division of the proceeds of the sale should such sale be effected.

After due consideration the court, August 2, 1901, decreed that the liquidator might enter into a contract with the new company, as desired.

Acting under this specific authority, the liquidator on December 4, 1901, entered into a contract with the new company whereby it was expressly agreed that "the price and terms of sale should be left to the new company and that the division of the proceeds between that company and the receiver (liquidator) should be left to arbitrators named in the new contract."

Thereupon the new company made its offer of sale to the United States.

The proceedings are entirely regular, and will be recognized by the bar as in perfect harmony with the practice that maintains in the courts of the United States.

The power to sell is sanctioned in the most unequivocal terms. The only matters unsettled are the distribution of the proceeds of sale between the liquidator and the new company, and after that is determined the distribution of the proceeds between the creditors of the old company for whose benefit the court administers the fund. But as to these matters we do not have the remotest possible concern. We will hold the property free of all French claims and the creditors will participate in the distribution of the funds derived from the sale, agreeably to the law in the French courts.

It seems to me that the views of the minority with respect to the power of the new company to convey to the United States a good title are perfectly sound and consistent with the practice of the French and American courts.

The position of the majority is certainly not well founded. It seems to me that they have taken an entirely erroneous view of the subject. Among other objections which they urge with confidence is the following:

Whatever peculiar decisions the French courts might make to throttle the bondholders and stockholders of the old company, as stated in the deposition of M. Lampre, even if those courts should hold that the rights of these 500,000 people are exterminated by the decrees of the French courts, we could not close the doors of our courts against such litigants. When they appeal to our courts for their rights as against the United States as the holder of the property, we have already declared, through the judgments of our Supreme Court, and of our State courts, in many adjudged cases—

I wish the honorable majority of the committee had favored the Senate with one of those adjudged cases—just one—that they could compel us to pay the bonds of the old company, with 5 per cent interest from the date of issue, and also the interest due on the stock subscriptions for at least ninety-nine years, or else surrender the property to them or to the company, it not having any lawful authority to sell to the United States. There appears to be no possible escape from this dilemma through any legal proceeding.

Upon what theory will dissatisfied bondholders and stockholders of the old company obtain admission to our courts after the French courts have duly adjudged their rights? "We could not close the doors of our courts against such litigants," say the majority. Why? Are the French courts powerless to pass final decrees and give litigants repose? Is it the rule of our courts to take jurisdiction of foreign litigants and their causes after they have proceeded to final decrees in foreign courts?

The question has been asked whether the liquidator can enter into a contract with the new company for a sale to the United States which would radically change the contract of sale to the new company.

I am clearly of the opinion that he can do so. He could not do so without the authority of the court having jurisdiction of the parties interested in the estate of the old company. That court authorized the liquidator to make the contract with the new company, and by a proper decree or order it may authorize him to consent to a modification of the contract or to a sale of the property of the new company, if that be deemed at all necessary, on the terms and in the manner now proposed. The liquidator is but the arm of the court. The court may clearly direct him, in the exercise of its broad equitable discretion, to consent to change the contract with the new company, accept his share of the proceeds of the sale to the United States, and distribute it to the parties before the court as their rights and equities may appear. This is in accordance with the universal practice. There is nothing novel or extraordinary about it; it is in consonance with the principles and practice of courts of equity everywhere.

Under the concessions of the Colombian Government to the French companies the New Panama Canal Company can not sell to the United States without the consent of that Government. Such consent has been obtained from that Government, and it stands ready to grant the necessary concessions to the United States to enable it to construct and forever maintain and operate the canal. Our right to construct the canal will not be derived from the new canal company, but must come from a treaty direct with the Colombian Government.

The Republic of Colombia offers to give to the United States all necessary jurisdiction over the canal and territory requisite for its construction and operation. The United States to pay to it a reasonable annual compensation, to be fixed by the two Governments every hundred years, except the amount for the first term is to be fixed at the end of fourteen years. The sum of $7,000,000 shall be paid by the United States upon ratification of a treaty, but is to be accounted for in subsequently fixing the annual compensation.

The above is proposed by the Republic of Colombia as the basis of a treaty and is subject to the further consideration and action of the two Governments. It is evidence of the disposition of the Republic of Colombia to grant to the United States necessary concessions and there is no doubt that a fair treaty will be effected between the two Governments.

We are not obliged to determine the wisdom or policy of the construction of an interoceanic canal. That has been determined by the people, and we are left to execute their wishes.

The canal, it is believed, will have a vital, beneficial effect upon the commerce of the United States. All sections of the country will share, in greater or less degree, in the benefits arising from the completion of this great highway.

The Isthmian Canal Commission has pointed out the advantages to accrue to our commerce so fully and well that I beg to direct the attention of the Senate thereto.

The canal will assist a wide range of industries, agricultural, mineral, lumbering, and manufacturing, and will promote the progress of all sections of the country. The expenses and delays at present incurred in the commercial intercourse of the Central, Southern, and Eastern States with the Pacific markets of our own and foreign countries, and in the trade of our Pacific States with Europe, impose a serious limitation upon the progress of American industries. Cheaper and more expeditious access to Pacific markets will benefit not only the Northeastern States by giving them cheaper raw materials and larger markets for their varied manufactures, and the Southern States by increasing their exports of cotton, cotton goods, forest products, iron and steel manufactures, and fertilizers, but also the Central West. The Central States are now manufacturing extensively for the foreign and domestic trade; the Isthmian waterway will give them a larger business with the Pacific coast and enhance their ability to meet European competition in western South America, Australasia, and the Orient.

The natural resources of the Pacific Coast States are such that their industries require an extensive commerce. Manufacturing activity is confined to a relatively narrow range, and large quantities of manufactured articles must be secured from the eastern part of the United States and from foreign countries. The major share of the exports, which consist mainly of food stuffs of various classes and of forest products, is now sent to Europe, the annual cargo tonnage of the maritime commerce with that continent amounting under the present unfavorable conditions of shipment to about a million and a half tons. The domestic and foreign trade of the Pacific Coast States is burdened with especially heavy transportation costs, whether the shipments be made by water or by rail. The cost of rail transportation is such that the tonnage of bulky commodities moved across the country for sale in American and European countries is now and must remain comparatively small. Cheaper transportation by an all-water route for the North Atlantic trade of the Pacific Coast States will be of great assistance to the development of that section.

The canal will have an especially direct and important effect upon the market for American coal. Vessels engaged in our own or European commerce through the canal will find it to their advantage to purchase American fuel on our Atlantic or Gulf seaboards, or in West Indian and Central American stations. The larger commerce which the canal will cause to move across the North Pacific may increase the demand for the product of the Puget Sound mines. The low cost at which coal can be placed at tide water on the Gulf and Atlantic seaboards, and the fact that there will be a considerable movement of vessels in ballast or with part cargoes westward through the canal, makes it probable that the coal required for industrial purposes on the west coast of South and Central America, and for commercial uses in those regions, and to some extent in the coaling stations of the Pacific, will be supplied from the mines in the southern and eastern sections of the United States. The demands at home for the coal of all the mining centers of the United States will be enlarged by the canal in proportion to its effect upon the development of American industries.

The effect of the canal upon the railroads in the Eastern and Southern sections of the United States will be favorable. The lines in the central West will feel the competition in rates somewhat more than will the Eastern and Southern roads, but the only business that can be diverted from them is the low-class transcontinental traffic, and this will be fully compensated for by the larger traffic due to the canal's effect upon the development and diversification of the manufacturing and other industries of the section they serve. The railways connecting the Mississippi Valley with the Pacific ports are the roads with which the canal's competition will be strongest, and the rates on a large share of their through business will be regulated by the water route. The through or trans-Cordilleran business originating or terminating at Pacific ports and subject to diversion to the canal is not a heavy tonnage. It constitutes only a small part of their total traffic, and during recent years has contributed less than the growth of their local business to the increase in their total tonnage.

Although over half the American tonnage now engaged in coastwise and foreign commerce consists of sailing vessels, steamers are taking their place so rapidly that probably only a small portion of the tonnage under the flag of the United States will consist of sailing vessels at the time of the completion of the isthmian waterway. Moreover, the canal will enlarge the demand for steamers, and hasten their substitution for sailing vessels. The Nicaragua route could be taken by the latter more advantageously than could one across Panama, but it is doubtful whether either route could be profitably used by sailing vessels in competition with steamers in any regular line of trade. There will always be a demand for sailing vessels for a part of our coastwise traffic, and for opening up foreign commerce with regions whose initial trade is small or of irregular volume. The canal will not eliminate them from ocean commerce, but will restrict the field of their employment.

The canal will effect large results in developing the industries and commerce of Pacific countries and increasing their trade. Those countries possess abundant natural resources, produce large quantities of food products and raw materials indispensable to the people of the United States and Europe, and export many manufactured articles not obtainable elsewhere. Although the people of most Pacific nations other than Australia and New Zealand have small purchasing power per capita, their numbers are so great that their total imports can reach a large sum. The commerce of the Pacific at the present time is of great importance to the United States and Europe and is rapidly increasing. Our commerce with Pacific countries is growing at a larger rate per cent per annum than is our trade with Europe, and the isthmian canal will enable the United States to control a greater share of the Pacific trade than could otherwise be obtained. The canal will be especially beneficial to the trade of the United States with western South America, where Europe now controls most of the foreign commerce. The new route will give a decided advantage as regards distance over Europe in the commerce of that section.

Our ability to manufacture for the markets of the trans-Pacific countries s evidenced by our steadily increasing sales to them in spite of the present high cost of transportation. The canal will place Europe and the United States on a basis of equality in distance for the trade of the Orient and Australasia. At the present time the advantages are greatly with Europe.

The honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], and I regret he is not in his seat, in a speech of rare power adverts to the colossal frauds which have been perpetrated in connection with the Panama Canal enterprise, and is of the opinion that it is not good national policy to take up the work where it is left off by the canal company. The distinguished Senator is not too severe in condemning the frauds which have heretofore surrounded the Panama enterprise. They are perhaps without a parallel. They do not, however, concern us, nor should they deter us from the use of a valuable route which nature has partially prepared for the purpose of commerce.

We have nothing but words of censure for those who have hitherto betrayed their trust and brought a noble undertaking into worldwide disfavor. But we take the property free from any taint. The title of the United States will be derived in an entirely legal and proper way. It will not come from those upon whom rests any stain or blemish.

Because those who initiated the Panama enterprise brought it into disrepute, shall the way to the construction of a canal at Panama be forever closed?

The honorable Senator further criticised some American gentlemen for representing the Panama Canal Company in the United States, including among the number ex-Secretary of the Navy Col. Richard W. Thompson, of Indiana. I can not believe that the Senator would attribute to the late Colonel Thompson the willful commission of any act which was in derogation of the high office he held, or which a gentleman of sensitive honor might not properly do. Colonel Thompson left the Cabinet of President Hayes to become managing agent of the American branch of the Panama Canal Company. At that time the company had not fallen into disfavor. What act Colonel Thompson did while connected with the company which would fairly subject him to criticism I have never heard mentioned. If there was such act, it has not been, so far as I am advised, made public.

Mr. President, Col. Richard W. Thompson was a distinguished and honorable citizen of the State of Indiana. He was a man of the utmost rectitude of character; he possessed in an eminent degree the respect and admiration of all parties and of all classes. There was no man within the limits of the State more beloved than he. When he died, but a few years ago, at the advanced age of nearly 92 years, he bequeathed nothing but the rich heritage of an honorable name. No stain whatever rested upon it. I believe that the most critical search of the records of the American branch of the canal company during the few years he was associated with it will disclose no act of his which could justly be made the basis of a charge that he had in the remotest possible degree betrayed his trust.

The pending bill appropriates so much money as may be needed to secure the necessary territory belonging to Costa Rica and Nicaragua for canal purposes, and in addition the sum of $10,000,000 for carrying forward the work of construction. The Spooner amendment appropriates such sum as may be requisite to acquire the necessary rights from the Republic of Colombia ($7,000,000 must be paid upon the ratification of a treaty; this amount is subject to change), and also $10,000,000 for forwarding construction, and in addition $40,000,000 for the purchase of the property of the Panama Canal Company. These various sums, amounting to $57,000,000, are to be paid from the Treasury.

According to the Commission, the cost of acquiring and constructing the Panama Canal, not including the cost of obtaining new rights and concessions from the Republic of Colombia, will be $184,222,358. The amount remaining to be expended upon the route after the appropriation of the $57,000,000 contemplated by the Spooner amendment will be, in round numbers, $134,000,000.

Shall that sum be paid from the Treasury from time to time as the work progresses, or shall its payment be made in whole or part from the proceeds of bonds maturing in the future?

I do not believe that the current receipts of the Treasury should bear the entire burden of the cost of the canal. The canal is to be built not only for the present but for future generations. The larger part of the burden should be equitably distributed over a period of years and be gradually liquidated out of the income of the canal, if that should prove to be adequate, and if the income should be insufficient, then it can be discharged by future taxation.

I am a firm believer that it is the wisest governmental policy to avoid incurring obligations which can not be met from the current income; in short, it is a good policy for the Government to pay as it goes. But here is an unusual undertaking; an extraordinary draft is to be made upon the Treasury. It should not be allowed to postpone the many improvements necessary to accommodate the public business and to impose a burden which would make necessary and imperative a considerable annual increase in current taxes. The cost of the work should be distributed over a reasonable number of years by the issue of bonds, so that it may be lightly borne.

We do not, of course, increase the burden upon the people by an issue of bonds for this purpose. The credit of the Government is so high that it can borrow the money at a low rate of interest and leave the money which otherwise would be required in the pockets of the people, at least for the time being. If the canal shall yield in tolls such sums as those who are competent to judge have estimated, a fund may be created for the gradual retirement of the bonds issued for construction without becoming a burden upon the taxpayers of the country, either now or in the future.

Should we pursue the policy of paying from the Treasury as the work of construction proceeds, the present taxpayers would bear the entire burden. They would not, in the nature of the case, be reimbursed from the revenues to be derived from the commerce of all nations when the great work is completed.

May we not, in equity and good conscience, defer payment of a part of the cost of construction by an issue of low interest-bearing bonds from time to time, as may be necessary, and then pay the bonds as they shall mature, in whole or in part, from the tribute which will flow from the commerce of the world when the canal is completed?

I would rather see the canal paid for out of the Treasury as the work progresses and without issuing a solitary bond therefor, but there are so many urgent and proper demands upon the Treasury that I fear it could not be done without imposing an undue burden upon it. Our expanding commerce requires larger appropriations for the improvement and protection of rivers and harbors; our Navy makes increasingly large drafts upon the revenues; the pension roll must be faithfully and punctually discharged—the extension of the rural free-delivery service is no longer an experiment—it has become an obvious and urgent necessity; the erection of public buildings is demanded in the prompt and proper discharge of the public business, and is necessary to avoid large expenditures in the way of rent for inadequate service.

These and many other familiar and necessary demands are pressing upon the current revenues of the Government, and will continue to do so during the progress of the construction of the canal and thereafter. So that it is the part of conservatism that we should make ample provision for the prosecution of the great isthmian enterprise, which is to benefit the future as well as ourselves, without forcing the Government to the alternative of increasing the tax rate or of abridging the work to which I have alluded.

I do not believe in a policy of putting undue burdens upon posterity, but believe for the reasons indicated that we may fairly provide that a just and equitable portion of the cost of the present work shall be paid in the future.

"There are considerations," as the Commission says, "more important than revenue." It may be deemed wise, in the exercise of a broad policy, to reduce the tolls so that they will cover merely the cost of operation and maintenance. If this should be done, the redemption of the bonds would be provided for from the Treasury as readily as payments could be made from that source during the progress of construction.

Provision may be made now for an adequate issue of bonds to prosecute this great national undertaking; or we may provide therefor in the future by appropriate legislation.

Mr. President, yesterday during the very able speech of the senior Senator from Washington (Mr. TURNER) a colloquy occurred, and, as it assumes to state the position of the opposition to the Panama route in a concrete way, I beg to read it:

Mr. CLAY. I beg to interrupt the Senator from Washington to say that if I catch his idea it is this: The old Panama Company was composed of seven or eight hundred thousand stockholders.

Mr. MORGAN. Stockholders and bondholders.

Mr. CLAY. Stockholders and bondholders. They had a charter from the French Government, as I understand the Senator. The old company, after having expended about $200,000,000, completed about one-fifth of the canal, and then the old company failed in business. The new company became the purchaser of the rights, privileges, and franchises of the old company. As I understand the Senator, they agreed in a contract to carry out the terms of the charter of the old company, and not only to complete the canal, but after it was completed they agreed then to pay to the stockholders and bondholders of the old company 60 per cent of their net profits.

I understand that the new company agreed to be bound—in fact, they were bound and are bound—by the terms and conditions of the charter granted to the old company. Now, I understand the Senator's position to be simply this: That if we buy the rights, privileges, and franchises of the new company we are bound to carry out its contract with the old canal company.

Mr. TURNER. The statement of the Senator from Georgia is substantially correct.

Mr. CLAY. In reading the report (and I have read both reports with a great deal of interest) I understand that the charter granted to the old Panama Company provided that all of the machinery used in the construction of the canal should be purchased in France, and all of the raw material used in the construction of the canal should be purchased in France. My understanding is that the new canal company accepted the same terms and conditions in regard to the construction of the canal.

Mr. MORGAN. That was the condition imposed upon the old canal company and the new canal company by an act of the Parliament of France when they were permitted to enter into what was called the "lottery bond scheme."

Mr. CLAY. Then, I will ask the Senator if it is not true that if we buy the charter and all other rights and privilegs of the new canal company the stockholders in the old canal company, saying that the new company owes them certain rights and that they took this property in trust for the purpose of carrying out those rights, and if we accept their privileges and franchises, knowing these facts, would not the Government of the United States be bound in equity to carry out all the terms of the contract with the old company?

Mr. MORGAN. It would be not only bound in equity, but bound in law. However, I will not undertake to explain that, because I am satisfied the Senator from Washington will go over the whole ground.

Mr. CLAY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. TURNER. I think the Senator from Georgia is entirely correct in his statements.

Mr. President, this seems to me to be an entire misconception of the legal questions involved, an entire misconception of the responsibilities we would assume by the purchase of the property of the new canal company.

The honorable Senators assume that the new company purchased the charter of the old company. It did not. It purchased the property of that company, but obtained its charter under the incorporation laws of France. The United States will purchase no charter. It needs none. It will buy simply and solely the property belonging to the new company, owned and controlled by it under a charter. Nor will the United States be obliged, if it purchase the property of the new canal company, to purchase from France the materials hereafter used in the construction of the canal.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] in his very able argument made use of this language, which attracted my attention at the time:

Here again let me call your attention to a difficulty right at this point. The New Panama Canal Company, which succeeded to the rights of the old Panama Canal Company, rest in part for what they have to sell upon French legislation, and French legislation was to the effect that if that company constructed that canal all the raw materials used in its construction must be of French origin. Query: We become the successors in interests of the New Panama Canal Company, as the New Panama Canal Company became the successors in interest of the old company. If we go on and construct that canal, must we follow this legislation? We are bound by it, are we not? Etc.

I should like to ask the Senator, as a distinguished lawyer, what his view is on that point. It struck me as being a most extraordinary proposition when it was uttered, and if it were true it would be a very troublesome factor in determining my mind on the question that is before the Senate.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I must dissent from the proposition of the able and distinguished Senator. I make this statement subject, of course, to correction, but as I understand it a lottery scheme was authorized by act of the French Parliament, under which the old enterprise was to obtain aid. Am I not correct in that?

Mr. KITTREDGE. Yes.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The act to which I refer is dated June 8, 1888. By it the old company was authorized to issue lottery bonds, and as a condition it was provided that—

All material necessary for the completion of the works shall be manufactured in France.

And that—

The raw material must be of French origin.

The new company is absolutely distinct from the old one. It can not exercise the power to issue lottery bonds. The purchase of French supplies was a condition imposed for the exercise of the lottery privilege.

Mr. GALLINGER. Manufactured and raw.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Both manufactured and raw; but that was an obligation which does not run with the property. When the old company went into liquidation and its property was transferred under a decree of the court, it passed free of all conditions and obligations of that character which might have theretofore existed against the company.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAY. A liquidator in France corresponds to a receiver here, as I understand it.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Yes; I understand so.

Mr. CLAY. If the property was sold at a receiver's sale by a decree of the court, without any conditions, then the purchaser would get it without any conditions and the old company would have no rights at all. I concede that. But if the property was sold by the old company, and the new company in purchasing the property agreed to carry out certain conditions, to build the canal within ten years, and after it was completed to pay the stockholders and the bondholders of the old company a certain per cent of its net profits, the old company then would have certain rights and privileges, and by reason of the sale it would not lose all of its rights and privileges. Then if we purchased these rights and privileges from the new company, would not the stockholders and bondholders of the old company in equity have some claim against our Government?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Senator's question is not pertinent to the particular subject I had under consideration, but I will stop and answer him now. There were conditions at the time of the sale. They were imposed by the court administering the estate of the insolvent company. Is not that true?

Mr. CLAY. My understanding——

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Well, is not that true? The conditions were imposed by a court administering the insolvent company's estate.

Mr. CLAY. I will state to the Senator that I did not so understand from the statement of the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER]. If the Senator from Washington was correct, I can not see how the decree passing the title could have any effect whatever. In order to divest the stockholders and bondholders of the old company of their rights and privileges they must have been heard either in person or by counsel. I have never heard of a court that could make a decree divesting any party of his property or of title to his property unless he was heard and made a party in court.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator will examine the record, I think he will come to the conclusion I have reached, that all the parties were represented before the court—bondholders and stockholders and miscellaneous creditors. Is it to be supposed for a moment that the court undertook to sell the old property in order that the new company might be organized and put upon its feet and accomplish the purpose which the old one had failed to accomplish, and that it transferred that property subject to all of the obligations of the bondholders and stockholders and miscellaneous creditors to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars? Is it conceivable that new capital, so essential, would have come in and invested in the new company if the property was burdened with the obligations of the old?

Mr. CLAY. I will simply state to the Senator that the Senator from Washington, in reading a copy of the decree of the court, stated distinctly that the bondholders and stockholders were not parties to those proceedings, and that they were neither represented by counsel nor had they any representative whatever, and they had no notice of the decree. I know nothing about it except what the Senator from Washington stated in his remarks.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. On the contrary, the parties had notice. Notice was given. The Senator will recollect that there was a special act to aid in winding up the affairs of the old company passed July 1, 1893. It was provided by that act, among other things, that ten days' notice at least should be given of decrees tending to alienate any assets of the company. The Senator will find upon an examination of the record that parties did intervene and interpose objections, and they were heard by the court, and the objections were overruled.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. With very great pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will look at that act he will find that it provided for the conveyance of the property.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I am much obliged to the Senator for the suggestion. The act expressly provided for the conveyance of the property.

The Panama enterprise was a subject in which the French people were interested. It had been a failure; the property was covered with innumerable bonds, obligations, and charges, and it was necessary that all parties should be brought into court and that the property should be sold clear of all incumbrances and obligations. In no other way could new capital be secured.

What are the rights of the old bondholders and stockholders in the new company to which the honorable Senator from Georgia refers? They are represented by the liquidator. What is he entitled to as the representative of the creditors of the old company? He is entitled to 60 per cent of the net profits of the new enterprise. How did he become entitled to the 60 per cent? Through an agreement entered into by the liquidator and the new corporation, under the clear and specific authority of the court. The point I make to my honorable friend is that the court, still having jurisdiction of the parties litigant and of the liquidator, and having authorized the latter to make the original contract, it can now empower him to modify, annul, or set it aside.

If the Senator, at his convenience, will kindly turn to page 156 of the hearings before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, Document No. 253, part 1, he will find the decree of the court, and on page 163 of the same document he will find the order of the court confirming the sale.

Recurring to the statement made upon this floor to the effect that the lottery scheme, with its burdens, passed to the new company, I wish to call attention to the testimony of Mr. Lampre, an eminent member of the French bar. On page 49 of the first volume of the hearings before the committee the following occurs:

M. LAMPRE. * * * In 1888 the old company was authorized by the Parliament in France to issue lottery bonds, which it did for the amount of 72,000,000 francs. But the issue was not all taken, you see. Part of it was left in the old company's treasury, because it was not subscribed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that scheme in existence yet?

M. LAMPRE. Yes; it is in existence.

The CHAIRMAN. The lottery scheme?

M. LAMPRE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It is still in existence?

M. LAMPRE. Oh, yes; a special corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. And the new company has the benefit of it?

M. LAMPRE. No, sir; the new company has nothing to do with it.

The CHAIRMAN. Why has not the new company the benefit of that scheme?

M. LAMPRE. Because it was not transferred to the new company. It was left outside of the transfer.

The CHAIRMAN. It was not transferred?

M. LAMPRE. No, sir.

The honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS], in the course of his very interesting and able speech expressed his unwillingness to question the motives of those who did not favor the Nicaraguan route. To those who know the honorable Senator, this statement was wholly unnecessary, for no one would impute to him an impeachment of the motives of those who might differ with him upon any question before the Senate.

It is unnecessary, it seems to me, that the question of personal motive should be raised, for there certainly is no difference whatever among us with respect to the ultimate object to be attained. The suggestion is made that those who oppose the construction of an isthmian canal are in favor of the Panama route, believing that its consideration will operate at least to further delay the enterprise.

Mr. President, there may be those who oppose any canal and who favor the Panama route for the reason indicated, but that suggestion certainly does not apply to those upon this floor who appear in advocacy of the Panama line. I can not believe for one moment that that motive inspired the Isthmian Canal Commission to recommend the adoption of the Panama route.

I have no doubt that the Commissioners were and are sincerely desirous of seeing an isthmian canal constructed by the United States at an early date, and that they recommended the Panama route because they believed as scientists, as men of large experience, as patriotic Americans, that the adoption of their recommendation would accomplish in the best possible manner the result we have in view.

Mr. President, I am opposed, for the reasons indicated, to the pending bill, and I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. It seems to me it is well guarded, it is eminently wise and conservative; and if it be adopted, it will have the result of securing to the United States an isthmian canal.

Senators have raised the question as to our ability to secure an unembarrassed title to the property of the new canal company. I do not believe their contention is well founded, but if I am in error in that view, and if those who believe with me are likewise mistaken, the Spooner amendment safeguards our interests.

Let me in a few words refer to that amendment. The first section provides that the President may acquire on behalf of the United States the property of the New Panama Canal Company at a cost not exceeding $40,000,000.

Section 2 provides that the President may acquire from the Republic of Colombia control of property and rights adequate for the construction and maintenance of the canal and appropriates a sum sufficient to effect this purpose.

Section 3 provides that when the President shall have obtained a satisfactory title to the property of the New Panama Canal Company and has secured the necessary property from the Republic of Colombia, he is authorized to pay the sum necessary to secure the canal property and the requisite concessions from Colombia. Not until the question of title, both from the canal company and from the Republic of Colombia, has been carefully determined does the United States part with a solitary dollar from the Treasury. After satisfactory title has been acquired the Secretary of War is directed to proceed with the work of constructing the canal.

It is further provided by section 4 that if the President shall be unable to secure a satisfactory title to the property of the canal company, and the control of proper concessions from the Republic of Colombia, then he is directed to go forward and secure concesssions along the Nicaragua route, and in the same manner construct a canal upon that route.

I differ with the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS], that this amendment is intended to defeat the construction of an isthmian canal. It is intended in a frank, straightforward, and intelligent way to secure a canal. The amendment is broad and liberal in its scope and purpose. It is founded upon the undivided judgment of a commission of eminent scientists and experts, patriotic citizens of the Republic.

I have great confidence in the opinion of the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. There is no one for whom I have higher respect and admiration, and I wish now, as a member of the Senate, to express to him my gratitude for the long years of faithful and efficient work he has given to the cause of an isthmian canal. But, sir, when the question is between following his judgment as to the advisability, the practicability, and the feasibility of the route to be selected or following the judgment of the Isthmian Canal Commission, formed after two and a half years of patient and devoted examination and work, I must beg to follow the opinion of the Commission.

I believe the American people will justify us in that conclusion, no matter what may be the fate of the enterprise in the future. I do believe that after we have spent a million dollars and waited two and a half years for their report it would be utterly inexcusable if we should set their report aside as not worth the paper upon which it is written. That report is here. It means something. It is, sir, in my judgment, the only rational and safe predicate for the action of Congress upon this important subject.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I have listened with much interest and instruction to my friend from Indiana. I should like to hear him upon the legal phase of the concession of the Colombian Government to the Panama Canal Company and its successors. He is a lawyer, and a very able lawyer, one of the strongest in the nation. Does he believe that this concession is such that it is for all time a valid one; that we would have egress to the canal from the Pacific and also from the Atlantic, or are the harbors reserved on both the Pacific and the Atlantic?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will state the situation with respect to the Republic of Colombia, as I understand it. There is a protocol between the two Governments which is to form the basis of an ultimate treaty. It is all tentative. The terms that are finally to be adopted are the subject of further negotiation.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Indiana a question.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. May I answer the Senator from California first?

Mr. MORGAN. Merely on the question of the protocol. Does the Senator contend that there is a protocol between the United States and Colombia?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I understand it is equivalent to that. It is a communication from the Republic of Colombia.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a mere draft of a convention, not signed by either party.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Well, I said it was tentative. I used the word "protocol." It might not have been entirely accurate; I rather think it was not; but I did say that it was intended as the basis of a future treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I am accurate in that.

Mr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It is the substance we are after, rather than the form. I take that tentative suggestion as an assurance on the part of the Republic of Colombia of her willingness to enter into a suitable convention with the United States granting to this Government proper concessions for the construction of the canal.

Mr. HANNA. And the transfer of the franchises of the canal by Colombia.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I thank the Senator from Ohio for the suggestion. The Republic of Colombia consents to a modification of its concession to the New Panama Canal Company and authorizes the transfer of the property of that company to the United States.

Mr. PERKINS. As I understand it, there is no perpetual concession, but only one extending for a period of one hundred years, and after fourteen years the same is to be the subject of negotiation; while, as to the Nicaragua Canal route, Nicaragua and Costa Rica have granted perpetual concessions to the Government of the United States.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. But the Senator will understand that this proposed concession of the Republic of Colombia for one hundred years is renewable again at its expiration for another like term, and so on indefinitely.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not wish to embarrass the Senator by questions, but I have asked the question in perfect good faith, because I look upon that, from a layman's standpoint, as one of the vital questions to be considered in connection with both of these routes.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The Senator gratifies me; he does not embarrass me. We are all seeking to learn the facts, and the facts must speak for themselves. I repeat what I said before, that what Colombia has proposed to do is reasonable assurance that we may hope to be able to secure from that Republic a satisfactory concession.

Mr. President, I shall not further tax the indulgence of the Senate. I have given in a somewhat hurried way the reasons which induce me to favor the construction of an isthmian canal upon the Panama route. The hour of doubt and debate has passed; the time to speak the potential word is here. It is my hope that we may soon enter upon the construction of a highway of vital interest to the commerce of the United States and the world, and which when completed will be one of the most beneficent and notable achievements of the new century.

Mr. MORGAN. As the Senator from Indiana has closed his remarks, I desire to take the floor.

Mr. STEWART. I ask the Senator from Alabama to yield to me for a few moments to allow me to dispose of a motion which has been made to reconsider Senate bill 4848.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. MORGAN. I do, provided it be without prejudice to the pending bill.

AGREEMENT WITH CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill (S. 4848) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, and for other purposes, was read the third time and passed.

After the bill was passed, I moved its reconsideration to give the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] an opportunity to offer an amendment. I now desire that he shall have the opportunity to offer his amendment, and if the Senate considers his amendment of sufficient importance to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, let it be reconsidered; otherwise, not. I want to have action on his amendment taken in connection with the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be impossible to do that under parliamentary law. The bill will not be open to amendment until it is before the Senate, and it can not be before the Senate until the vote has been reconsidered by which the bill was passed.

Mr. STEWART. I suppose the amendment might be discussed without actually reconsidering the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that it is only a question of a moment to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. That can be done, and it will take no more time to do that than it would to follow the course suggested by the Senator.

I want to be frank with the Senator from Nevada. The amendment which I offered, and which was printed, is not the only amendment that I desire to offer, nor the only one which I should have offered had I been in the Senate when the bill was under consideration.

Mr. STEWART. I shall then oppose any motion to reconsider. I ask that the motion to reconsider be overruled and that the Senator be allowed to make any statement he desires in regard to his amendment, but I do not propose to open the bill to general amendment, which will lead to further delay.

Mr. BAILEY. Not for general amendment. There are a few amendments only. One relates to the judgments, and the other relates to that provision in the treaty which requires citizens of one class of towns to pay exactly twice as much for the lots they buy as citizens in another class of towns.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. BAILEY. If I can not make that clear to the Senator——

Mr. STEWART. I can make a statement which will relieve the Senator's mind.

Mr. BAILEY. Possibly the committee has taken some action on that.

Mr. STEWART. There are two classes of towns, and a different rule applies to each.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, by unanimous consent, possibly we can eliminate that provision.

Mr. STEWART. I am opposed to the reconsideration of the bill, but the Senator can make his showing on the question of reconsideration, and I will reply to it if I feel called upon to do so. I think he will be satisfied that the bill ought not to be reconsidered when he hears my explanation, for I expect to satisfy him.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Nevada and myself agreed about these matters originally, and I see no reason why we should have separated in the meantime. He had the same view that I had about the judgments and the other points. I am prepared to proceed.

Mr. STEWART. If you prefer me to go ahead, I will do so.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEWART. I will give the Senator from Texas all the advantage of making a fair statement of the case.

Mr. FORAKER. I should be very much obliged to the Senator, and I have no doubt other Senators would, from the inquiries that are passing around here, if he would tell us what the bill is about.

Mr. STEWART. That is what I am about to do.

Mr. FORAKER. And what the question is?

Mr. STEWART. That is what I am about to do.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians was passed.

Mr. STEWART. By the act of 1896—I think that was the date of the act—the Commissioners to the Five Civilized Tribes were authorized to admit to citizenship and make enrollments of certain Indians.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator knows so many facts about this thing that I think he misapprehends the question that was asked regarding this matter. I think he ought to explain to the Senate that a few days ago the Senate passed a bill to ratify an agreement made with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians about certain matters in their nation, and that after the passage of the bill by the Senate the Senator was told that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] had an amendment of which he had given notice and which he intended to offer to the bill when it was pending, and to give the Senator from Texas an opportunity to offer that amendment. The Senator from Nevada filed a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. Now the question is whether the Senate will reconsider.

Mr. STEWART. I inquired of the members of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes and got a statement of the matter in issue, which I will send to the desk to be read. It will explain the matter as well as anybody can explain it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
COMMISSION TO THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES,
Washington, D. C., June 10, 1902.

SIR: In answer to your inquiry with regard to applications for citizenship in the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes, and also in other tribes, I have to say:

An act of June 10, 1896, authorized the Dawes Commission to admit to citizenship and to make enrollments in addition to the enrollments made by the tribes themselves. The applications were required to be made within three months from the date of the passage of the act, and the Commission was required to decide all the cases within ninety days after the applications were made. Applications were made in the several tribes by between twenty and thirty thousand people. It was impossible for the Commission to examine with due care such a vast number of applications in the brief period of ninety days.

An appeal was allowed from the decision of the Commission to the United States court in the Indian Territory. There were two courts sitting, one for the Choctaw and one for the Chickasaw Nation. The law required that the appeal should be taken in sixty days from the date of the decision of the Commission. There were in the Choctaw and Chicasaw nations several hundred cases, including about 4,000 claims. The value of the land claimed by them, at present estimated worth, would reach over $20,000,000. The vast number of cases overwhelmed these two court, and the judges were forced to have many of them investigated by referees.

Each of the nations had one counsel, which made due preparation of the appeals an impossibility. Most of the lawyers living in these nations were engaged for the applicants, consequently they were really disqualified for acting impartially as referees; but there were few other lawyers from whom to select referees, therefore the cases were reported by lawyers who themselves had similar causes before the court. The cases were so numerous that the judges were compelled in most instances to rely on the reports of the referees, and were unable to give them such personal attention as their merits required.

These facts have inspired the Indians with distrust, and it must be admitted that such conditions do not commend themselves to the judgment of fair-minded men. The Indians, in fact, are very much dissatisfied, and contend that they were deprived of an opportunity to secure fair hearings in these important matters.

To require the Indians to prove specific acts of fraud or perjury in such a mass of cases which were rushed through in the manner described would deprive them of any fair opportunity to assert their rights. There must have been many cases decided upon inadequate testimony. In fact several hundred names were improperly interpolated into the judgment of the courts, which matter the Commission investigated and reported to the judges, whereupon the courts eliminated them. If the Indians are not allowed to have cases retried where they are able to show affirmatively that the plaintiffs were not entitled to enrollment, they will never be satisfied that justice has been done.

Very respectfully,

TAMS BIXBY.

Hon. WILLIAM M. STEWART,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, these judgments obtained in the hurried manner in which they were in overloaded courts have been a matter of comment for a long time. The commissioners of the Five Civilized Tribes have at various times been before the committee, and various reasons have been set forth by the chairman of the Commission and others stating that there was no fair judicial determination of these cases.

It will be remembered that the people seeking to be enrolled are all white people. It would be very difficult, I am told, to distinguish them from other white people, but they claim to have Indian blood in their veins. You will see that it affects a vast portion of the property of the tribes. The Indians would not make any treaty until this could be rectified in some way. They finally made a treaty, and in that treaty they put two test questions. The Indians contended that, inasmuch as each tribe had to contribute land jointly, both tribes ought to have been served with notice. They make that test question. Another question that they put up is that the hearing before the court should have been on the papers which were submitted to the Commission. In the treaty, as it came to the committee, if those questions were decided against them they were out of court. The committee have, with the aid of the Assistant Attorney-General, modified those test questions, so that when the cases have been tried and decided, if decided against the claimant, the claimant may still go on with his case. So neither of the test questions will throw him out of court.

The original treaty provided for the cases being tried before certain judges who had not participated in the judgment against the claimants. The judges are overcrowded down there, and if again tried by them it would be a repetition of what has already occurred, and the claimants do not think that they can get justice in that way. So, after a great deal of consultation with the Department, and to make it satisfactory, so that a fair trial could be had, the committee have provided for a court, to last a year or more, to determine these cases, that court to consist of three judges. That will give an opportunity for a judicial determination.

In the amendment of the committee inserting section 32 of the bill it is provided that—

Said citizenship court shall also, upon the final ratification of this agreement, have jurisdiction of suits to annul and vacate judgments of the courts in Indian Territory rendered under said act of Congress of June 10, 1896, admitting persons to citizenship or to enrollment as citizens in either of said nations where, in a bill of complaint filed by the two nations jointly or by one of them acting separately and making the other a party defendant, it is charged and made to appear that any such judgment, for any reason other than those hereinbefore specified, as a basis for said test suit, does injustice to either of said nations by according citizenship or enrollment to any person or persons not justly entitled thereto, but no such suit can be instituted after the expiration of ninety days after the final decision in the test suit hereinbefore authorized.

So that it is a little more than a new trial. It must be made to appear that injustice has been done.

The amendment of the Senator from Texas is altogether too large. The words he proposes to strike out are these:

for any reason other than those hereinbefore specified, as a basis for said test suit, does injustice to either of said nations by according citizenship or enrollment to any person or persons not justly entitled thereto.

And in lieu of those words to insert:

was procured by perjury or fraud on the part of the applicant, his witnesses, or attorneys.

Each tribe had an attorney. They could not look after these cases personally, and they were thrown in, as it were——

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Nevada does not desire the Senate to understand that the court was compelled to dispose of these cases within sixty days?

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. BAILEY. Only the appeals were to be heard. Does the Senator not know that nearly all of these cases when they came to the court were actually tried?

Mr. STEWART. They were almost all of them tried by referees. The court would not have been able to try 4,000 claims in such a limited time. The most of them were tried by referees. Mr. Bixby and other members of the Commission have been before the committee, and stated that the cases were tried by referees. The peculiarity of these referees was that they were all, or nearly all, attorneys in the Territory.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Nevada knew those attorneys as well as I do, he would not make that reflection on them.

Mr. STEWART. I do not make any charge against them. There were two attorneys, one for each tribe, and the balance of the attorneys were doing business for the Indians, and of course they were engaged in their own cases. There was such a similarity in all the cases that I doubt if any attorney who was engaged for an applicant was fit to be an impartial referee in any other case.

It was necessary for the applicant to show that he was an Indian and had a right to claim the tribal relation.

Mr. BAILEY. That he had Indian blood.

Mr. STEWART. That he had Indian blood and was also entitled to admission under the arrangement. I understand that some of them might have Indian blood, but they would not necessarily belong to the tribes. Is that not so?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. In order to be admitted he must not only have Indian blood, but he must belong to the tribe. He must have tribal relations. Such cases are very difficult to try. The idea of disposing of 4,000 cases in a very short time is ridiculous, and they were all to be taken up within sixty days, and only two lawyers to take them up. It was a physical impossibility to try 4,000 cases in sixty days.

As the commissioners say, they discovered afterwards that some 200 names had been unjustly included, and when the commissioners called the attention of the court to it they were eliminated. Nobody will contend under the circumstances that there has been a fair and judicial determination. This has created great dissatisfaction, inasmuch as the people who are claiming are mostly white, and you can hardly pick out one who looks like an Indian. They are bright men, competent men, and able to take care of themselves. The Indians now claim that on this state of facts, showing that these men were unjustly put upon the record, they ought to have the matter tried before a fair court. That is all there is of this question. It has been before the committee for a long time; it has been before the joint committee of the two Houses, and has been referred back and forth to the Department. The Department has been consulted almost every day about it for the last month or two.

At first blush I did not like the harshness of their original treatment. I did not like the idea of the cases being decided on this technical question. I did not think they should be thrown out of court without provision for allowing them a hearing. I did not think they ought to be relegated to any special judges who are overcrowded.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. How long ago were these judgments rendered?

Mr. STEWART. They were rendered about two or three years ago, I think.

Mr. BAILEY. Some four years ago.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Practically two years ago.

Mr. BAILEY. The original act was passed in 1896, requiring them to go before the Dawes Commission in sixty days, and requiring an appeal to be taken within another sixty days. We do not complain now of the insufficient time, but that only allowed four months.

Mr. STEWART. There have been applications for a new trial before the Committee on Indian Affairs at every session. It is contended that there was not a fair trial. The cases have all been investigated, but the circumstances were such that they could not have been investigated fully and fairly. I think the committee has been very careful to protect the rights of these parties by giving them an impartial court to be appointed for that special purpose, consisting of three men, and if on technical grounds they have been thrown out, they can go on with their cases. It cuts nobody off, but it says if the Indian can allege and can make it appear that injustice has been done in admitting persons to citizenship under those judgments, they may have another hearing. That is all there is of it.

Mr. SPOONER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Does it require an act of Congress to entitle the tribe to file a bill alleging fraud or injury to an estate?

Mr. STEWART. Of course they can file it, but it will require authority to do it.

Mr. SPOONER. They could file a bill, could they not, under the authority of Congress?

Mr. STEWART. I do not think they could go into the courts without the authority of Congress. We undertook to settle this question by the Dawes Commission. I do not think the Indians can secure redress in any other way than that pointed out. They are our wards. They are not standing on an equal footing with us, and can not do as they please. They are under the control of the Dawes Commission. The only redress they can have is to make it appear that injustice has been done—not merely allege it, but substantiate it by proof. That is the situation, and the amendment of the Senator from Texas would require them to prove fraud and perjury. There might have been no witnesses at all.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course these were judgments?

Mr. STEWART. Well.

Mr. SPOONER. The appeal from the decision of the Dawes Commission to a court was provided for by law.

Mr. STEWART. Yes; to a court.

Mr. SPOONER. And that resulted in a judgment one way or the other.

Mr. STEWART. A judgment?

Mr. SPOONER. A judgment of the court.

Mr. STEWART. An opinion of the court—hardly a judgment the way they were piled in. It would hardly rise to the dignity of a judgment.

Mr. SPOONER. A finding of fact.

Mr. STEWART. A finding of fact.

Mr. SPOONER. A judgment which this bill recognizes as a judgment.

Mr. BAILEY. This bill calls them judgments.

Mr. STEWART. You may call them judgments, but they are practically ex parte judgments.

Mr. SPOONER. The bill so far recognizes them as judgments as to authorize legislation setting them aside.

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. If they are judgments, and if the Senator is right in his theory that there is no court and no cause of action, I can understand why they should be given a right to file a bill to set aside these judgments upon the ground of fraud—perjury, of course, would be fraud—or perhaps on the ground of mistake. You go beyond that, and include the word "injustice."

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. What injustice could be done to the tribe except the injustice that resulted from adjudging one to be a citizen and entitled to enrollment who in fact was not?

Mr. STEWART. And they have to show that, too.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that what you mean by injustice?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir. That is what it says—by enrolling those who were not entitled to enrollment. That is the injustice.

Mr. SPOONER. It is granting a new trial, then, by act of Congress?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir. Suppose it is. This is dealing with the Indians. We are dealing with them as our wards. This is a mode of determining who are members of the tribe. It was begun, but failed to accomplish it. They have not had the chance to have a hearing. The idea of requiring them to bring up 4,000 cases, involving 4,000 questions——

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator desires to be correct, there are not 4,000 cases.

Mr. STEWART. No; about 1,500.

Mr. BAILEY. One of these cases has a hundred or more persons whose testimony was identical. They were establishing a family ancestry, and the decision of one decided many. There were several hundred cases, as stated here.

Mr. STEWART. There were 1,500 or more cases.

Mr. BAILEY. Here is the letter of the chairman, and it says several hundred cases, involving 4,000 claims.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I should like if I can to make a concise statement of the situation in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations with reference to these citizenship cases. Of course the title to their lands has been a common title. We are now and have been for some years endeavoring to divide the land among the citizens of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations. Each has common interests in the lands belonging to both of them. It is not necessary to go into that.

There are, outside of the parties who have been admitted by the court in the way in which the Senator from Nevada has mentioned, 18,000 acknowledged Choctaw citizens and 6,000 acknowledged Chickasaw citizens. The cases in dispute are 2,800 in the Choctaw Nation and a thousand in the Chickasaw Nation. There is to be divided, if the division is confined to the 18,000 Choctaws and the 6,000 Chickasaw citizens, an average of about 400 acres each. So, as the letter of the chairman of the Commission says, if the rights of the persons who have been declared citizens are acknowledged, they come in for their share of the division, and the land which they would get in the aggregate is estimated as being worth about $20,000,000. It is a large stake to play for. The 18,000 Choctaws and the 6,000 Chickasaw citizens are persons who have lived in the nations. They are understood to be the real Choctaw and Chickasaw citizens.

When it appeared that there was to be a division of lands, a great many new claimants came in. They came in from outside of the nation—from Texas, and from Arkansas, and from surrounding States everywhere—and claimed that they were entitled to Choctaw citizenship; that they were descended from some remote ancestor, and that although, as the chairman says, they were mostly white, they had Indian blood in their veins, and that entitled them under the laws of the two nations to citizenship. They had never claimed citizenship before. Generally speaking they had not resided in the Territory or affiliated with the Indians who constituted those two tribes.

I do not know that I ought to mention a circumstance which I heard of two or three years ago. I do not know whether it is true or not, but it illustrates the flimsiness of a good many of these claims. I was assured that a white man cut a small spot in his hand, pricked a little blood from an Indian's vein, and dropped it into his vein in the presence of two witnesses, who then swore that the man had Indian blood in his veins and they knew it, and that he was thus admitted as a citizen. I do not know whether or not it is a true story.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Then if that case happened, would not the judgment be set aside under the amendment I have proposed?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Of course it would. I do not know that it is true. I have been led to believe it is. I merely speak of it to illustrate how anxious people were to become Choctaw and Chickasaw citizens when they were playing for stakes, each one of them amounting to three or four thousand dollars.

Now, the facts about these cases as I understand them are these: Originally the Dawes Commission, of which Mr. Bixby is the chairman, under the law was to determine applications for citizenship. All of 4,000 persons, or now 3,800, eliminating 200 whose names were written into the rolls fraudulently, were rejected by the Commission. The Commission admitted many, but rejected 3,800. They appealed from the Commission to the court in the Indian Territory in the two districts. Of course, it was for the interest of the Indian tribes to resist those cases.

It is true, as the chairman said, that pretty much all the attorneys in the two nations had been employed in citizenship cases, and either had citizenship cases pending at the time or had had citizenship cases. So the Indians were reduced in their selection of attorneys to a very few attorneys. Each tribe had an attorney. It was utterly impossible for the attorneys whom the Indians could employ to try those cases thoroughly, and, besides all that, these attorneys advised the Indians that the act was unconstitutional, and for that reason very little defense was made in the court against the admission of these 3,800 people. The Indians thought the act was unconstitutional; and thereupon we passed a law, if I am not mistaken, submitting the question whether the act was unconstitutional or not to some court, and it finally reached the Supreme Court of the United States, and was declared to be constitutional. But it had its effect to prevent the tribes from making such a defense as they might otherwise have made in opposition to the admission of these persons as citizens.

Then, so far as the trials did progress, it was utterly impossible, with the counsel whom they could secure, even if they had not been advised that the act was unconstitutional, to try those cases as they ought to have been tried. They were referred to masters or examiners to take testimony and make report. In many instances those examiners were persons who, having a particular case before them, were employed on behalf of other persons claiming citizenship to get their admission. The result was that all these 3,800 cases were reversed by the examiners, and their report, when it came to the court, was accepted practically without question.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that to my personal knowledge that statement is not accurate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. In what respect?

Mr. BAILEY. To my personal knowledge there were referees' reports rejected, and in many cases there were trials before the judge.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Oh, there were exceptions.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I beg to say that I live within 40 miles of where one of those courts held its sessions, and I have knowledge that it is of some value in a case of this kind.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I can only state what has come to my attention.

Mr. BAILEY. And what has come to the Senator from Connecticut, I will say with all respect to those gentlemen, has come from agents and attorneys of the Indian tribes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Indian tribes have an immense stake in this matter.

Mr. BAILEY. But still——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is not often that we try in the Senate in this offhand way a case involving $20,000,000, as this does.

My information is that while some of the examiners' reports may have been objected to and there may have been trials of some of the cases, generally speaking they passed as matter of course. At any rate the judgments were obtained reversing the decision of the commission and admitting those persons to citizenship.

Immediately there was a protest made, and the Senator from Arkansas thought at that time that the protest had such weight that Congress ought to declare those judgments void. I remember very distinctly that that was his contention at the time. It was two years ago when I first began to hear of it. There were some technical questions as to whether or not the judgments were correct on the ground that notice ought to have been given to both nations when it was given to only one, and that the cases ought to have been tried in a different way from that in which they were by the court.

On the whole, Mr. President, although they are judgments and although my first idea was that Congress ought not to interfere with a judgment, I found here a case where there was no remedy that I knew of, no opportunity for the Indians to contest these cases any further, with a weight of protest and statement which would convince and does convince anyone who listens to it that there has been injustice done to these nations in the decisions.

Then came the question, What were we to do? It was suggested, as the Senator from Texas suggests, that we would give a new trial, or constitute a court, or give some court authority to review those cases where the Indians could prove fraud or perjury. But the circumstances under which those cases were tried would make that a very inadequate remedy; and when I came to consider that the people of these nations were our wards, that they were not as well versed in their rights as citizens of the United States who had been brought up to understand our laws would be, I felt that no harm could be done the claimants by having a retrial of these cases.

I think, Mr. President, if we should not grant it and then these parties should, under the judgments obtained in this way, come in and share lands with these other persons who have always been connected with the tribes, to the extent of $20,000,000 in value, we should always feel that we had not done justice to the Indians of those two tribes.

I do not know that I need to go any further in this matter. If you say simply that there are to be retrials in cases in which the Indians can prove absolute fraud or perjury, you are not going to reach this evil, if it is an evil. The cases will be very few, probably, in which that can be done.

I agree, as the Senator from Wisconsin suggests, that the rule of law is that a judgment is not to be interfered with, or there is not to be a retrial, except in cases of fraud, perjury, or mistake, or for newly discovered evidence, or for some of those things which are understood among white people and our own citizens to be ground for a retrial. But as to these Indians, who were advised that the law was unconstitutional, who manifestly did not make any proper defense against these applications of white people, so far as color is concerned, to come and share with them their rights in the lands and in the tribal funds and in all their possessions, it seems to me we should adopt a somewhat different rule from that which we adopt with reference to our own citizens who have grown up with an understanding of their legal rights and the methods of obtaining them. I think the case has such an obvious injustice as it now stands that we ought to see that justice is done.

Mr. BAILEY obtained the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senators concerned in this matter will indulge me for a few moments, for my personal convenience I wish to put into the RECORD some papers relating to the canal matter, and then I will yield the floor and they can go on. It will take only a few moments.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course I would not interfere with the convenience of the Senator from Alabama, but the Senator from Nevada is anxious to dispose of this matter and I shall take but a moment or two.

Mr. MORGAN. Will there then be a vote?
Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir; so far as I am concerned.
Mr. MORGAN. Take a vote this time of the day?
Mr. BAILEY. I think there will be a vote.
Mr. MORGAN. There is not a quorum here. I wish to introduce some papers into the RECORD. The Senator had better let me go on for just a few moments.
Mr. BAILEY. The only trouble about it is that two Senators who have opposed my amendment have presented their views, and if the Senator from Alabama goes on about the canal bill we certainly will not be able to get a vote this afternoon, because there being no vote on that and no vote expected on this, Senators naturally absent themselves. I will agree with the Senator from Alabama to stay here until he does get in the papers.
Mr. MORGAN. I have no power to compel Senators to stay here, and I have no such disposition. I yielded to the Senator from Nevada. I had a right to hold the floor.
Mr. BAILEY. The trouble is that the Senator from Alabama allowed both the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Connecticut to proceed.
Mr. MORGAN. I will not be amenable to any criticism whatever on the subject. I am trying to do what is fair between gentlemen. The Senator from Nevada told me his matter would take a very few minutes, and here almost an hour has gone.
Mr. BAILEY. I shall take less time than was occupied by the two Senators on the other side.
Mr. President, the question is simply this: There exists in the courts of the Indian Territory something more than 3,000 judgments entitling the plaintiffs in those cases to certain rights as members of the Indian tribes. Those judgments were obtained in the regular and due course of a law which Congress passed authorizing those people to apply first to a commission, which was a tribunal created by Congress, and the tribe or the applicant, if dissatisfied with that judgment, to appeal to the regularly constituted court of the United States for the Indian Territory.
The Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Nevada would both impress the Senate with the idea that there was a great rush, a great hurry, and consequently a great injustice. All that the Senate needs to do to inform itself that they are misinformed is to compare their statements. The Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Connecticut would both have the Senate believe that everybody who applied was adjudged entitled to citizenship; and yet the statement read by the Senator from Nevada from the chairman of the Dawes Commission asserts that over 20,000 people made applications, while the Senator from Connecticut declares 3,800 of them were successful. I undertake to say that 3,800 out of 20,000 is a small proportion of successful plaintiffs in any kind of litigation.
But after complaining at the haste, he left the Senate to believe, as I should have believed it myself had I not known better, and I therefore questioned the Senator from Nevada, that all these cases had to be appealed in a great hurry and therefore were improperly decided. I call upon the Senator from Nevada to say if there is anywhere anything in this record or in the contention of these Indian tribes that they were defeated on account of an insufficient time for appeal. There is no such contention, but on the contrary their appeals carried their cases properly to the court and they were tried by two distinguished judges.
To declare that those judges awarded judgment and sacrificed the rights of those Indians without a due regard for the law and the facts is an imputation that I have never yet put upon a court and never will without a better reason than has been advanced in this case.
With one of the judges in that Territory I had the honor to serve in the House of Representatives, and I happen to know that he stood for his convictions under circumstances that made others waver. I do not believe that either Judge Townsend, whom I do know, or Judge Clayton, whom I do not know, would have permitted a wholesale injustice against the Indians, and yet the only possible pretense upon which Congress can be asked to grant a new trial in these cases is that those judges were ignorant or were not upright. Is there any message here from the judges that they could not fairly try and decide every case? Not a line.
Let me tell the Senate that when this treaty was first negotiated—negotiated by the Dawes Commission, too—they had a provision in it that no judge in the Indian Territory who had ever decided a case against one of these tribes should be competent to sit in the trial of these cases, thus branding with Congressional suspicion a judge who had felt called upon by his conscience, upon the law and the facts, to decide a case against the Indian.
The Senator from Nevada says the Indians are dissatisfied and distrustful about these judgments. The Indians are always so about everything and everybody. I live near enough to them not to take the extreme view of our honored President, who in his life of Benton says the country has treated them too well, nor yet the idea of my friend, the Senator from Connecticut, who thinks the country has treated them too ill. The truth in this instance as in all others lies between the two extremes. The Indian is neither as bad as some people think he is nor as good as I have heard sentimental people portray him.
The statement that all these cases were tried by referees is also a mistake. Many of them were tried by the judges themselves. The Senator from Connecticut said—and I am familiar with that case—that in one case reported by the referee somebody interlined a number of names. That is true; but it is also true that the court itself, when it came to pass upon it, struck them out, thus showing that in this case, at least, the judge was neither negligent nor overworked. I feel sure that all through this litigation the rights of the Indians have been as well safeguarded as the rights of any other litigants in those courts.
The statement has been made that the Indians thought the law was unconstitutional, and therefore did not attempt to defend these suits. If we accept that as a good ground for a new trial, we will establish a rule of law.
These people contended that the original act was unconstitutional, and they importuned Congress until we gave them authority to institute an appeal. It was tried in the Supreme Court of the United States and decided against them. They then went back to the Territory with full knowledge that the law had been held constitutional by the highest court of the land. They had excellent attorneys. One of the attorneys was a lawyer good enough to be selected by President McKinley as a district attorney for the southern district of the Indian Territory.
Now, Mr. President, that there were frauds committed I have no doubt, and I will be the last man here or elsewhere to attempt to shield a fraudulent judgment against those Indian tribes. But that these Senators are not after the fraudulent judgments alone is made manifest by the fact that they refuse to accept an amendment which authorizes the court to vacate judgments procured by fraud or perjury.
I will tell the Senate what is behind it. There were two judges, as has been stated here, for these respective tribes—Judge Clayton, whose principal session of court was held at South McAlister, in the Choctaw Nation, and Judge Townsend, whose principal session of court was held at Ardmore, in the Chickasaw Nation. It so happened that Judge Townsend took one view of the law and Judge Clayton another view. This agreement originally disqualified both of these judges to try any of these proceedings to annul a judgment, because both of them had decided cases against the Indian tribes, and it is a matter not of suspicion, but conviction, with the Indians that whoever decides a case against them decides it dishonestly.
Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Was not that provision in consonance with the provisions we make in a great many instances in regard to an appellate court or a court of review, where we provide that a judge who has heard the case below shall not sit in the appeal?
Mr. BAILEY. Of course he would not sit in the particular case which he decided, but it does not disqualify him to sit in another case which he did not decide.
Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Well, if the cases were practically of the same nature would it not?
Mr. BAILEY. These cases are not practically of the same nature. It is true that many of them involve the same questions, but each case stands upon its own testimony; and while one case might be fully sustained by the testimony the very next one might completely fail.
Mr. STEWART. The committee eliminated all that and provided for an impartial course of procedure. The committee took the matter into consideration and made careful provision as to the agreement, excluding judges, etc.
Mr. BAILEY. That, Mr. President, is true. Judge Townsend, who tried, we will say, half these cases, held to one view of the law. Judge Clayton, who tried the other half, held to a different view. It so happened that many of the cases which were decided in favor of the applicants by Judge Clayton were decided adversely to the applicants by Judge Townsend, and other cases decided adversely to the applicants before Judge Clayton were decided favorably before Judge Townsend. Thus it happens, as it always will when you have two courts trying the same question without any final appeal to a court that can harmonize their conflicting opinions, there were two rules under which these people were adjudicated.
Now, if you establish the one court, consisting, as this bill provides, of three judges, there will be but one rule; and what will happen? If that court adopts the view of Judge Townsend, it must then exclude all of the people admitted upon the opposite view of Judge Clayton, or if it adopts the view of Judge Clayton it must then exclude all of the men admitted under the opposite view of Judge Townsend. The result is that under any view adopted by this new court it must hold that at least half of these applicants are not entitled, as a matter of law, to their judgments.

But mark you, Mr. President, although that court holds that the men who were admitted by Judge Townsend were not entitled, it can not then admit the men who ought to have been admitted by him, under the new court's view of the law; and I declare that this is the very purpose of the vague and indefinite proposition that a judgment rendered by a court of the United States shall be set aside upon a ground that would not be considered on a hearing for a new trial in any court in Christendom. Neither the Senator from Nevada nor the Senator from Connecticut nor any other Senator on this floor will venture to assert that there is a court in the civilized world that would entertain a motion to set aside its judgment upon the vague and indefinite ground that it had done somebody an injustice.

Mr. President, I am willing to go further than cases of fraud. If these gentlemen are seeking to destroy the judgments where there was no trial, I will agree to an amendment authorizing the court to set them aside upon a sufficient showing. Will the Senator from Nevada agree to that?

Mr. STEWART. I could not make an agreement. The language there is the result of the consideration of the joint committee who put it into the bill. The language was thought to be entirely adequate. It provides that they must show that injustice has been perpetrated in admitting persons who are not entitled to be admitted. They have to make that showing because there was no trial or because there was fraud. No matter how it happened, they must show that injustice was done in admitting persons who ought not to have been admitted. I think that, having been tried by the judges who differed from each other as widely as they did, the judgment has not the solemnity that the judgment of a court would have. If one judge decided one way and another another way, it is high time that we should have some tribunal which can reconcile the matter and set it right.

Mr. BAILEY. Did not Congress provide that tribunal at the time? Why require an American citizen to incur the labor and expense of prosecuting his rights before the courts which Congress had established and then say that Congress did not do its duty then and require them to undergo that expense and labor again?

Let me tell the Senator from Nevada that both the judges who tried these cases have been reappointed to their respective positions, and will he ask the Senate to believe—without seeking to introduce any partisanship into this question, will he ask his own side to believe that judges who have been appointed by the one President would have been reappointed by his successor when they had robbed these people of what Mr. Bixby says is $20,000,000 worth of property, and what the Senator from Connecticut says is $7,000,000 worth of property?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I said twenty.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood the Senator to say seven. I will venture to say that $7,000,000 would be a very large estimate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I took the statement as read as I came into the Senate, I think, from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. BAILEY. No, it is not from the Secretary of the Interior, but from Mr. Bixby.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. From Bixby, then.

Mr. STEWART. The number of acres is given and it can be figured out.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, and if it was not for the white people who have gone into that Territory that land would not be worth 50 cents an acre. They have given it the value it possesses. They have gone there in good faith under the law of Congress passed six years ago. They have procured their judgments, and have improved their allotments, and it would be a shameful outrage now to set those judgments—some of them five years old—aside and take the improvements made under the sanction of a judgment of a United States court upon the vague and indefinite allegation that somebody had suffered some sort of an injustice.

Mr. MORGAN. May I have the indulgence of the Senator from Texas for a moment?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to state that it has been agreed by the Senators who are engaged on opposite sides of the canal bill that at 2 o'clock on Thursday of next week the bill and amendments shall be taken up and voted on without debate. I ask unanimous consent that that agreement may be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). Senators, you have heard the request made by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPOONER. That means amendments now pending and which may be offered afterwards?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the Chair shall state the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands the request, it is to this effect: That a vote shall be taken one week from to-morrow at 2 o'clock in the afternoon on the bill commonly called the Nicaragua Canal bill and the pending amendments and all amendments that may be offered at that time.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. KEAN. Without further debate?

Mr. MORGAN. Without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without further debate after 2 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There is one thing that perhaps ought to be understood, and that is whether it cuts off an opportunity to vote on any amendment which may be pending between now and Thursday a week, or whether all the amendments have to lie until that time before they are voted on. That question always comes up in these unanimous-consent agreements.

Mr. MORGAN. I know it does.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That should be fully understood.

Mr. MORGAN. I would not take a vote on any amendment in the absence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA], who is going away on a matter of personal interest to himself. I would have no objection to taking a vote sooner than that time on any amendment that might be offered, except that the amendments offered, with the exception of the one proposed by the Senator from Georgia, are so radical that they mean the adoption of one canal route or the other, particularly the amendment accredited to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] reported by the minority of the committee. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia relates only to the agency through which the canal shall be constructed, and I would be willing to take a vote upon that at any time which might be agreeable to the Senator from Ohio, but on the others I would not be willing to vote before 2 o'clock on Thursday because of his absence.

Mr. SPOONER. That is right; but I shall want to offer some amendments to that amendment, not changing the nature of it at all, but perfecting it.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course. The only thing is that we shall commence voting at 2 o'clock and vote on, without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is further understood that a vote on all the amendments except one, the amendment of the Senator from Georgia and amendments to that amendment, may be taken at any time prior——

Mr. ALDRICH. It is the other way.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, lately in all these unanimous-consent agreements there have been no votes upon amendments between the time when the consent was given and the time which arrived for action. In my judgment it is a great deal better that there should be no votes on any amendments until 2 o'clock on Thursday, if that is the time agreed upon.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I will so frame my proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. That is right.

Mr. MORGAN I will frame my proposition in that way, that there shall be no vote until Thursday at 2 o'clock, and that at that hour the bill and all the amendments shall be taken up and thereafter voted upon without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Alabama, then, is that the final vote shall be taken upon the bill and pending amendments, and all amendments which may be offered, at 2 o'clock on Thursday, a week from to-morrow.

Mr. MORGAN. Beginning at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Beginning at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SPOONER. The amendments are limited to 2 o'clock. I suppose the agreement includes those offered after 2 o'clock and at any time until the final vote.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course; all amendments, either those pending or those that may be offered.

Mr. SPOONER. Until the bill is finally disposed of?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

AGREEMENT WITH CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW INDIANS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. STEWART to reconsider the votes by which the bill (S. 4848) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, and for other purposes, was passed.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like very much to have a brief executive session any time within a half hour, if I can get it. I am compelled to leave the Senate before 6 o'clock.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course I desire to accommodate the Senator from Illinois. There is one more phase of this particular question that I desire to discuss. I am inclined to think that even as it stands it is plain enough, and I will consent to take the vote at once. I should like to have an understanding with the Senator from Nevada that if we should vote in the affirmative, then he agrees that the amendment I have offered may be adopted without further objection, and if we vote in the negative, that of course concludes the whole matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator to assent to a vote now?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] to reconsider the votes by which Senate bill 4848 was ordered to a third reading and passed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I wish to take one minute.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well, Mr. President. I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas. It may be that I will desire to say something further.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I want to state to the Senate the way this proposition appeals to me.

The Chickasaws and Choctaws were each interested in the land of either nation. Suits were brought for citizenship against one nation or the other, and the other nation was not made a party to it. The Indians have always complained that both nations should have been parties to each of those suits, and that for that reason those judgments ought to be set aside or they ought to have a rehearing on that question. They have contended for that for a long while.

When this agreement came up to be made between the Choctaws and the Chickasaws and the Government to get rid of certain controverted questions between them and the Government, among other things they insisted that they should have an opportunity to have that question passed on by a court. There was another question of procedure in which they thought there ought to be some change. Now, this provision goes into the bill:

For any reason other than those hereinbefore specified—

The ones I have just referred to, where it—as a basis for said test suit, does injustice to either of said nations by according citizenship or enrollment to any person or persons not justly entitled thereto, etc.

The Senator from Texas proposes to strike out those words because it permits either one of these tribes to go before this newly constituted court, and show that injustice has been done in this case or that case or the other, toward these people when citizenship was accorded to any particular man. He proposes to limit these words to cases where they can show that injustice was done by perjury or fraud.

Now, I believe that the appeal ought to be wider than perjury and fraud alone. If these people can go into this court that is to be newly constituted, and can show to the satisfaction of the court that injustice has been done in any particular case, I believe that there should be a reexamination of that case. That is all it means.

The difference between the proposition of the Senator from Texas and the one the committee proposes, and the one I believe is right, is that we propose that this examination shall not be confined to cases where there have been perjury and fraud alone, but where substantial injustice has been done to these people from other causes and they have made it to appear and the court is satisfied of that fact. That is all there is to it.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the Senator a question before he sits down?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to know if the committee is a unit on this proposition.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understood so.

Mr. STEWART. The joint committee is a unit.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The joint committee agreed to it.

Mr. STEWART. The joint committee is a unit.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The joint committee of the House——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The joint committee agreed to it.

Mr. BAILEY. If Senators are going into the action of the committee, I wish to state that the Senator from Nevada agreed with me that these judgments ought not to be opened in this general and indefinite way, and I positively know that Mr. STEPHENS of Texas did not agree that they ought to have been opened in this way. When the statement is made that the joint committee was unanimous, I have his statement that it is an outrage to authorize judgments to be vacated upon any such vague and indefinite ground.

Mr. STEWART. My first impression was like that of the Senator from Texas, but after investigating it I have come to the conclusion that the report of the committee is right.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator, of course, understands that I would not go into the question of the committee except for the question of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON]. The Senator from Kansas knows as well as anybody on this floor that the Indians are pretty well able to take care of themselves, for he was their attorney for quite a while.

Mr. STEWART. The committee acted in modifying the agreement with a view of reaching substantial justice. Having two parties and having it go upon the record—those technical questions under the agreement if decided against the applicant would be final.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the committee's action there is all right.

Mr. STEWART. We worked that out, so that in case of a technical question decided against them they can have a hearing in the court right along.

Then, as to the other trouble, that we should confine the cases to perjury and fraud, there may be other irregularities, but they must be made to appear to the court. It is to be a court of three, and the language is not only that they must allege, but they must make it appear to the court, that injustice has been done in admitting them to citizenship. I think that is a safe provision, and I do not think the results will be very different, because if they make it appear that injustice has been done they must show something substantial, although it might not be actually fraud. Even though it be no fraud it may be such a miscarriage of justice that, under the circumstances, a court would feel bound to intervene. I think there may be many cases of that kind here from the history I get of it.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada reveals the whole trouble in the very last and the apparently unimportant statement he makes, and that is how "he gets it." His whole information comes from the Indians' representatives, some of whom are good people and some of whom are not. I want to be entirely candid with the Senate. One of my neighbors is an attorney in many of these cases. He is as good a man as I ever knew, and as honest a man as any of us. I get most of my information from him, who is interested as an attorney, the same as these gentlemen get theirs from the attorneys of the Indian tribes.

Mr. STEWART. And they are just as reliable.

Mr. BAILEY. I know some Indian attorneys are gentlemen whom I would rely on, but this neighbor's word I would take the same as I would take my own, because I know he is a man of honor, and he tells me most of these cases have been fairly tried.

Now, the appeal I wish to make to the Senate is this: Will you set the precedent of staining the character of your judges? Will you destroy the sanctity of judgments without first making the direct charge that they were procured by fraud? I undertake to say that never before in the American Congress from the foundation of this Government and never before in any other enlightened country was application made to the legislative department for a new trial upon such vague and indefinite grounds as these. These gentlemen are not more anxious to protect the Indians against fraud than I am, and I have proposed an amendment which is ample for that purpose. I will go further, and I will agree to set aside judgments rendered by masters who were attorneys in related cases.

I have made every kind of proposition to these gentlemen. Their whole contention in the beginning was that there had been wholesale fraud and perjury committed. I am opposed to a legislated new trial, but I am willing to waive my general objections to that in favor of the Indians, and I will agree to vest the court in the Indian Territory with the power to set aside every judgment that was procured by fraud or perjury.

Mr. STEWART. You see how vague and indeterminate would be the attempt to prove perjury. Some of these men swear that they are not guilty of perjury. They come in with stories about pedigrees. Most of them are ancient tales that they tell; but you could not convict them of perjury, even if they had been guilty of swearing falsely. It would be an impossibility to convict them of perjury in a case where the pedigree of 4,000 people was involved, all claiming to have Indian blood. It would be entirely useless to attempt to do so, although their statements would be a fraud in the legitimate sense of the term.

The commissioners and officers of the Government have been before the committee session after session, and have given it as their opinion that many of these judgments—the great mass of them—were wrong; that many of the men in whose favor they were rendered were white men, never having been connected with the tribe. That was the opinion of the Commission; and the Commission decided against pretty much all of them on the ground that they were white men and did not belong to the tribe, but the court reversed that decision.

There seems to be a hardship in the matter, but I believe the committee has arrived at about the proper conclusion. Not only has the committee determined it, but the Department has been consulted about a dozen times about it. We went down there with this proposition, and the solicitor of the Department looked it over and thought that under it substantial justice could be obtained.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], in referring to myself, as I have been an attorney at one time for one of these tribes, might leave the impression that I was an attorney at the time these cases were being tried.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not intend to create any such impression.

Mr. BURTON. I want to say that these judgments would not have been rendered if I had been an attorney in these cases. I was an attorney afterwards. About 2,000,000 acres of land were involved in these cases. I have been surprised at some things the Senator from Texas has said; and that is a kind of quasi testimony here that some of these judgments were rendered regularly. I can not testify as having been present. I was not present when any of the hearings were had. I happened to be counsel for the Chickasaw Nation after these cases were over; I have been down there a good deal, and if there was anybody in that country, white or black or red or any other color, who believed these judgments were valid and just I could not find him.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Kansas was down there as an attorney, and he was not looking for that kind of testimony, as a matter of course.

I thank the Senator from Kansas—if it will not interrupt him—for saying that he was the attorney after these judgments were rendered, because that confirms my statement that they are four or five years old. The Senator has been in the Senate for now more than two years, and of course he has not been an attorney for Indians during that time.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator is mistaken about how long I have been in the Senate. I have been in the Senate since a year ago last March. I have not been an attorney for the Chickasaw Nation since I have been in the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course not.

Mr. BURTON. But I was the attorney for a short time before that of the Chickasaw Nation.

I want to say just a word in regard to these judgments. As I understand, the counsel for the Indians had assumed that the act was unconstitutional, and advised them in such a way as that practically no trials were had. That is my information.

Mr. BAILEY. I will agree to an amendment authorizing them to open the judgments where there was no trial.

Mr. BURTON. But, Mr. President, it might be very difficult to determine what was a trial. As I said, I understand the bill to propose that substantially these cases shall be heard de novo by a court to be constituted by the treaty.

Mr. STEWART. Where they can show that injustice has been done in admitting persons who are not members of the tribe.

Mr. BURTON. That puts the burden upon the Indian to show that injustice has been done. There were instances where one who was claimed to be an Indian was an Irishman, as I am credibly advised, and others where he was a negro or a citizen who had lived there for years and had paid taxes as an Indian, but had never claimed to be an Indian, as in several cases they were pointed out to me when I was there.

I want to say, in addition to that, that these cases were never heard in such a way, as far as I am advised, to the end that judgment should be rendered, as in ordinary cases at law. If the Indians are required to show that injustice has been done, certainly under all the circumstances this bill ought to pass as it has been reported.

I am perfectly safe in making the statement, so far as the Chickasaw people are concerned, that the dominating influence down there, beginning with Governor Johnson and embracing all the leading Indians, is not to shut out anybody who is a Chickasaw Indian. There is no disposition to do that at all. I have never found in my relations with the Chickasaw Indians a single bit of effort at any time in that direction, and they know better than anybody else who are Chickasaw Indians.

I can not speak so well for the Choctaws, because I do not happen to be acquainted with the governor of the Choctaws. Certainly under the circumstances in which these cases come to us, having first been thrown out by the Dawes Commission—and I will say right here that the Dawes Commission understand the people of the Territory and the relation of the Indians to the white men better than anyone else down there——

Mr. BAILEY. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. BURTON. Not at all.

Mr. BAILEY. Assuming that the Dawes Commission and the judges are equally honest, equally able, which is the more apt to have rendered a proper decision, the body that tried 20,000 cases in ninety days or the body that tried several hundred cases in two or three years? The Dawes Commission, according to the statement of the chairman, had over 20,000 cases before it, which it had to decide in ninety days, and it decided them by the wholesale. The court had several years in which to try several hundred cases. Assuming that they were equally honest and equally wise, which would be the more apt to render a proper decision?

Mr. HOAR. If I may make one suggestion right there, I wish to say that Henry L. Dawes, of the Commission, is a citizen of my State. Mr. Henry L. Dawes was in this Senate and in the House of Representatives for thirty-six years, and studied the Indian problem during all that time.

Mr. BAILEY. But he did not study Indian genealogy.

Mr. HOAR. He is an honest and a wise man, and I would rather have his judgment on any such question than that of any other single man I know of.

Mr. BAILEY. Rather than that of any court with the testimony before it. I want to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that while he exceeds me in admiration for ex-Senator Dawes, he does not exceed me in respect for him. I believe he is just as honest a man as the Senator from Massachusetts thinks he is; but no honest man could decide 20,000 cases in ninety days, and no commission composed of honest men could do so. The Commission pursued the only course open to them. They could not consider them all, and they rejected them all, leaving them to be decided by the courts.

Mr. BURTON. No one can state, I had almost said a fallacy, or even a truth for that matter, as strongly as my friend from Texas. The facts are that Arkansas and Texas just emptied themselves into the Indian Territory, and it did not take very long to throw most of their cases out.

The members of the Dawes Commission who gave consideration to these cases are just as honest—and I had almost said as able—as our great friend Dawes from Massachusetts. They understand better than anybody else the nature of these fraudulent applications, and they knew good and well that the applicants were not Chickasaw Indians.

The Chickasaw Indians know who are Chickasaw Indians; and they got at the truth of this matter. I do insist that no harm can come to these litigants if they are Chickasaw Indians. They will have no trouble, and no Chickasaw Indian will have any trouble in establishing his claim to his share of this land. If the matter is left where it is now, you have got to prove fraud or perjury; a great many of these cases will fail; and, in my opinion, a very great wrong will be done, provided it goes through in that shape. But I am as well satisfied as I am that I am standing on this floor that if this amendment does go on the bill that treaty will never be ratified by the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to say that I desire an executive session this evening. I shall be obliged to leave the Chamber in a little while, and if this discussion is to go on at length——

Mr. STEWART. It will not go on long now.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to have an executive session.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I only wish to make one observation, which I failed to make when I made a statement of this case.

You would suppose that the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations were the persons who were entitled to determine who were entitled to citizenship among them. That would be the natural supposition, but the United States has assumed it and put it in the first place in the hands of the Commission, and in the second place, if an appeal was granted, put it in its own court.

The Choctaw Nation and the Chickasaw Nation have courts, and if this question had been left there they would have decided it for themselves; but now that we take it away from them, take it away from their own courts, they insist that a great injustice has been done. It seems to me we can make no mistake in allowing them to have a review of the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate agree to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed?

Mr. BAILEY. One moment, Mr. President. In order to meet every possible suggestion, I am going, if the bill is reconsidered, to substitute the words "false swearing" for "perjury," and add "mistake;" so that if an Indian has lost judgment by any kind of false swearing, or by even an honest mistake, it will give him a new trial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not believe that my duty will allow me to suffer this question to be decided without a roll call; and the trouble about that is that it cuts off the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. I suggest to the Senator, if he desires a roll call, that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. BAILEY. I am willing.

Mr. STEWART. I would not object to that if we could have an assurance that the matter could be concluded to-morrow.

Mr. BAILEY. I could call for the yeas and nays and then ask unanimous consent that the matter go over until to-morrow.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. President, I ask that the matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have some understanding that if it is to go over until to-morrow it shall then be disposed of.

Mr. BAILEY. The roll call having been ordered, it will be the first thing in the morning.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The question will still be open to debate. I do not see why there should be such intense haste about deciding a matter which, as I said, involves $20,000,000, as stated in the letter which was read here, or even $10,000,000. It seems to me it is worthy of thorough discussion.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; let it go over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 12, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FUR-BEARING ANIMALS IN ALASKA.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file the views of the minority upon the bill H. R. 13387, being the bill relating to fur-bearing animals in Alaska.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to file the views of the minority on the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MCCALL. And I ask that we may have leave to file this at any time to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman couples with his request that he be permitted to file these views during this day.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13387) relating to fur-bearing animals in Alaska.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HAY. To call up a resolution of inquiry which has become privileged.

The SPEAKER. Is it a privileged resolution?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir; a resolution of inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion, however, that the special order will now shut off such a resolution. The Chair has held back requests for unanimous consent and other requests this morning, in order that the committee in charge of the floor may hold it. The rule requires that this be in order immediately after the reading of the Journal on each day. The Chair, therefore, feels compelled under the rule to recognize the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CORLISS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Under this rule the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union without motion. Therefore the House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, in pursuance of the rule.

PACIFIC CABLE.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. LACEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5) to authorize the construction, operation, and maintenance of telegraphic cables between the United States of America and Hawaii, Guam, and the Philippine Islands, and other countries, and to promote commerce.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire just how much time I consumed on yesterday? I understand, one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Sixty minutes.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I think I demonstrated yesterday from the evidence of experts that only one cable from our country to Manila at the present time was necessary, because there are two other cables in existence that can be utilized in case of an emergency. I conclusively established the fact, from expert testimony and from parties who are competent to make a bid, that a cable can be built, including cable ships—two of them, and only one is necessary—for less than $10,000,000; and I simply want to call the attention of members to the further fact that Great Britain is building a cable through the Pacific as long as ours will be and the contract is only $8,900,000.

I have conclusively shown from the testimony of experts that this cable can be operated for about $350,000 per annum, not taking into consideration the interest on the capital. Now, you gentlemen do not want to conceive that we are going to have a great army of men employed by the Government through this. There are only five stations embraced within this project. Three experts can operate it twenty-four hours at each station. Fifty men employed will supply the necessary service to operate these five stations. So that it does not require a large number of Government employees. It is a peculiar utility; one that the Government can take hold of without detriment to any other interest in our country.

It does not infringe upon the right or the interest of any American capitalist. Unless the Government undertakes this work—and mark what I say—unless the Government undertakes this work you can not secure the erection of a cable plant upon the California shore, which is as necessary as a battle ship—as necessary as a navy-yard—more so, because there are navy-yards that can, in case of necessity, repair battle ships, but there is no cable plant upon the Pacific coast that can repair a cable during war.

There are no cable ships owned by our Government at the present time that can repair a cable in case it is cut in war or in peace. During the Spanish war our Government was humiliated to the necessity of asking a cable ship that happened fortunately in our waters to go down to Key West and lay a cable from Key West to Dry Tortugas, 60 miles. An English cable ship, at an expense of $70,000, laid 60 miles of cable for our Government. Could you do that if you were at war with Great Britain?

Now, one word with reference to the cable between Hongkong and Manila, and the members here ought to think of that question. I hold in my hand the Washington Post of June 2, in which it is stated, upon the authority of the Commercial Cable Company, that the only cable between Hongkong and Manila had been broken. Do you know that not a word or a message can be sent to our people in the islands of the Philippines, that it is absolutely in darkness so far as cable communication is concerned, and has been since the 1st day of June?

The fact that the Commercial Cab le Company makes this an nouncement shows to you, as it shows to me, that they are the people in this country in touch with that great corporation. God Almighty, for some cause, has severed that cable as an example to the representatives of our people, showing to them the dangers of interruption of cable communication. Are you aware that the War Department has ordered battle ships to be used as dispatch boats to carry messages from Hongkong to Manila? Of course, we sit here and do not mind anything about it, and yet that costs nearly $2,000 a day. These dispatch boats are running between Hongkong and Manila to carry messages between the officers and soldiers and their friends at home because we have no communication with Manila.

I speak of it for this reason. The Eastern Cable Company have had that cable for many years. They have had exclusive control of the communication from our Government, and, as stated by Mr. Squiers, they have received, on the basis of 40 cents a word, which they charge from Hongkong to Manila, $72,000 a year for the use of that little strand, amounting to $288,000 in four years; and yet they leave this Government in a condition so that the breakage of simply one strand leaves us with no communication with that archipelago with 10,000,000 people upon it.

If they are looking out for the interests of our Government, do not you think they would have placed their cable line in a condition so that they would have fortified against this very accident? I submit whether our Government can afford to be subjected to the control and neglect of such a monopoly.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied one hour and seven minutes.

Mr. CORLISS. At the end of eight minutes more I would like to be notified.

Mr. Chairman, there is this bugbear of government ownership here, and it speaks out on all occasions. I do not blame members for appealing against Government ownership. It is natural, and I am not in favor of the Government going into the ownership of railroads and telegraph lines generally. This is an entirely different thing. It is an absolute necessity. I have in my possession a letter which I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to read, a letter he has from the man who at one time was seeking to get this right—that is Mr. Scrymser. He has constructed 12,000 miles of cable, extending from our country to foreign countries. He desired to construct this cable line, and for some years sought the right to do so.

The Senate passed a bill carrying a specific subsidy to that concern to build this cable line, but the House refused to consider it. Subsequently, in the Fifty-sixth Congress, the Senate passed the Government-ownership bill, providing for the Government to lay a cable from California to Hawaii, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was the instrument through which that was defeated in this House. It has caused a loss of more money than the whole cable would have cost. It has cost our Government to send communications to Hawaii by ship more than that cable would have cost, during the Fifty-sixth Congress, had that amendment to the sundry civil bill been permitted to pass this House.

Will you stand here and continue, just because you include something for the Government to do, to hold back the progress of this nation? I want to call your attention to some things that you have done in other bills. At this very session gentlemen on this side of the House voted to put in the river and harbor bill an appropriation authorizing the Government to go into the dredging business, because up in Cleveland they had organized a combination to raise the price of dredging to the Government, and you authorized the Secretary of War to build a dredging machine and go into that business. Do you call that paternalism? You have done another thing.

This very session you have authorized the Government to build its battle ships in the Government navy-yards, and you did so even over the ruling of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole. Do you call that paternalism? Far more than that. There are other matters of the same character that you have authorized the Government officers to take hold of. For instance, you ordered the Secretary of the Navy, in case he could not secure armor plate, to build a factory for the construction of armor plate. My God, gentlemen, if those things are necessary to break down combinations—if such things are necessary to give the Government the right to avail itself of public utilities at a reasonable price, how much more important this measure is to the American people!

I say to you that there is no interest, no capital, no company or organization in our country that will lay this cable except the United States Government, barring the Eastern Cable Company and its American ally.

And now one word and I will conclude. These parties say that they have gone on and made a contract for a cable; that they are going on to do the work. They are acting without authority of law, without regulation of the Government. They asked the President for the necessary authority, and he refused to give it to them, and submitted the question to Congress.

But now I say to you that I have within twenty-four hours received the information that not a solitary foot of the cable proposed to be laid by Mr. Mackay's company from California to Hawaii has yet been made. That information comes to me from a source that is reliable, and I defy Mr. Mackay or any other person to say one foot of that cable has yet been made. This information comes from a man connected with the company that has the contract to make the cable, and his reason for saying that it has not been made is this, that his company has contracts for cables amounting to over 30,000 miles, and therefore they have not reached this cable. They can not make it quicker for our Government than our own plant can.

Is there any need of our turning this matter over to those parties? Is there any haste in it? Are we going to leave the people forever in darkness out there, subject to the dictation of this corporation? God forbid! If the Government be given control of this enterprise, we shall advance our interests in trade, in military power, in national influence, and shall break down monopoly. Turn the enterprise over to these other parties and you block the wheels of progress. I submit for your information a letter from Captain Squier with reference to the Manila-Hongkong cable:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 6, 1902.

Hon. JOHN B. CORLISS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your letter of the 4th instant asking for additional information relative to the proposed trans-Pacific cable, namely, "What, in your judgment, is the effect of the present interruption of cable communication between Manila and Hongkong upon our interests in the Philippine Islands and what means may be taken to guard against this danger in the future?"

The Philippine Archipelago is connected to the telegraph system of the world by a single line from Manila to Hongkong, at present interrupted, entirely isolating this archipelago except by commercial steamers or Government dispatch boats.

Ever since the American occupation of the Philippines it has been a matter of deep solicitude to the Chief Signal Officer of the Army and War Department, to protect at the earliest moment, our communications to this archipelago by the laying of at least one additional connection as soon as possible, to prevent total interruption.

The Philippine Archipelago is the only example in the world to-day of a country possessing over eight millions of people, which has not its telegraphic cable communications protected by at least one duplicate line.

Even the British colony of New Zealand has double cable connections to Australia, and before the year is out will have these connections further secured by a third line from Australia to Vancouver, in connection with the British Government trans-Pacific cable.

The only reason why other cables have not been laid connecting the Philippine Islands with the Asiatic coast is the existence of an exclusive concession granted by the Crown of Spain to the Eastern Extension, Australasia and China Telegraph Company, which will not ultimately expire until the 8th of May, 1940, which is held by that corporation to prevent any other corporation or government from landing a cable in the Philippine Islands.

In answer to the first part of your question as to the effect of the present interruption of cable communications between Manila and Hongkong, it appears that the laying of at least one additional cable connecting the Philippine Islands to the Asiatic coast is at the present moment a military and administrative necessity of such weight and possible value as to override all other considerations of any nature, and that such a cable line should be laid at once by this Government.

The possible harm to our interests in the Philippines resulting from telegraphic isolation can not be measured by any ordinary standards.

The quickest dispatch boats require two days to reach Hongkong.

Besides the great damage to our interests from a military, administrative, and political standpoint, from being cut off from the United States, it is of course possible that in case of any extraordinary calamity happening in the Philippines, such as the recent Martinique disaster, a great conflagration in Manila, a severe cholera epidemic, the loss of a troop transport, or a great typhoon, such as the Porto Rico hurricane, the loss and suffering from a humanitarian standpoint might easily prove terrible and, indeed, a national reproach.

The amount of money involved in laying such a cable, therefore, seems of no reasonable consideration.

The second part of your question is:

"What means may be taken to guard against this danger in the future?"

1. Due to existing concessions, the United States Government itself is the only party besides the Eastern Extension, Australasia and China Telegraph Company which can lay such a cable from the Philippine Islands to the Asiatic coast.

2. Since the original concession granted by Spain included not only the Philippine Islands, but other Spanish islands in the Pacific Ocean, such as the Marshall Islands and the island of Guam, and since Spain has disposed of these islands in part to different parties, it must be ultimately a matter for the courts to decide as to what damage may be sustained.

3. The German Government, by the purchase from Spain of the Marshall Islands, which are included in the concession referred to, stands practically in the same position in respect to the connection of these islands to the Asiatic coast under the concession as the United States does in so connecting the Philippine Islands.

4. That the Government of Germany does not acknowledge the force of this exclusive concession with respect to the Marshall Islands is indicated by the terms of an agreement signed at Berlin July 24, 1901, between the German and Dutch Governments, whereby government cables are to be laid connecting the Palaos Islands and Marshall Islands with Shanghai, China, as well as with the Dutch East Indies.

5. That the Government of France does not recognize the force of certain exclusive concessions from the Chinese Government to this same cable corporation for the coast of China is indicated by the fact that recently the French Government has landed a Government cable on Chapel Island, off the city of Amoy, connecting her colonial possessions at Saigon, and later intends to continue such French Government cables to Shanghai, connecting with the Siberian lines under Russian control.

6. Japan has granted an exclusive concession to the Great Northern Telegraph Company, a Danish corporation and an ally of the Eastern Extension Cable Company, which will expire on December 27, 1902, yet which practically extends for a period of ten years thereafter through a special provision contained therein which prevents the Japanese Government itself or any other Government or corporation other than the Great Northern Telegraph Company from connecting Japan to the Philippine Islands by a submarine cable.

Since Germany has recently entered into an agreement to lay a Government cable from the Marshall Islands so as to connect with Shanghai and France has recently laid a Government cable connecting Saigon to Amoy, it would seem reasonable to presume that this Government can also land a cable on the Chinese coast.

An American Government cable should be laid from the northern part of the island of Luzon—such as at or near Aparri, which now has practically duplicate Government land lines direct to Manila—to Amoy or Shanghai, China.

The distance from Aparri to Amoy is approximately 450 miles, and the distance from Aparri to Shanghai is approximately 800 miles.

Shanghai, at the mouth of the great Yangtze River, is the New York of China. It is and will be the commercial center. A cable from northern Luzon direct to the small island of Gutzlaff, at the mouth of the Yangtze River, would give the Philippine Islands direct telegraphic communication with the present telegraph center of the Far East.

At this point there are duplicate lines to Japan and duplicate or triplicate lines by two routes to Europe. At Shanghai the Northern Telegraph lines via Siberia and the Eastern Company's lines via the Mediterranean and India meet, and these cables land on this small island.

It would appear, therefore, that although the line will be considerably longer, it would be better to lay the line direct to Shanghai for political and commercial reasons, just as the island of Haiti is connected by cable to New York City instead of to the coast of Florida, which would be much shorter.

A cable landing at Amoy on Kulangso Island, now a foreign concession, instead of at Shanghai, would give the strategic advantage of the exclusively controlled communication between our eastern military and naval base at Manila with our proposed coaling station at Amoy by a shorter route, but it would not so directly reach Japan nor give direct telegraph communication with the direct commercial city of China.

Either one of these lines of cable can be laid by this Government at much less expense and saving of time than by any private corporation, since the Government now has in the Philippine waters the cable ship Burnside, fully equipped.

The Burnside has laid over 1,200 miles of Government cable connecting the different islands of the Philippine group, and has a trained staff which maintains these lines. It would be practically no extra expense to the Government to lay the cable to China, nor any additional expense to maintain it after it is laid, as the Burnside is required in Philippine waters to take care of the present interisland system.

This cable can be made at the rate of 200 miles per month by American manufacturers, who have furnished all of the 1,300 miles of cable now in use in the Philippines.

As indicating the necessity for a Government-controlled cable, it is remarked that although the present single cable line has been already interrupted for five days, and General Chaffee has at his command at Manila a fully equipped American Government cable ship capable of repairing this cable as quickly and efficiently as any cable ship in the world, yet because the cable is private property he is powerless to repair it, and the United States Government must wait till the company's repair ship, viz, the Sharad Osborne, stationed at Singapore, can be spared for the repair.

Since this same ship also has the care of the company's private cables west of Singapore to India, if she happens to be engaged on distant work at the time of interruption of the Manila line the United States Government has to wait upon private interests until she can be spared.

An analysis of the testimony submitted to the committees of Congress during the past few years having the trans-Pacific cable in charge clearly shows that this same span of cable connecting the Philippine Islands to China and Japan has been, is now, and will remain the pivotal link in the whole enterprise.

It is about the exclusive concessions supposed to control this link and which opens the door to the East that the whole discussion of an American trans-Pacific cable has really revolved.

It is the most important link in the trans-Pacific chain, and since it can be laid by this Government in six months with no additional facilities not now possessed its value as an insurance against further total isolation of the Philippines would be realized in the very near future and during the period of two or more years which the construction of the longer spans across the Pacific will necessarily require.

Very truly, yours,

GEORGE O. SQUIER,
Captain, Signal Corps, United States Army.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CRUMPACKER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 5094. An act for the relief of the persons who sustained damage by the explosion of an ammunition chest of Battery F, Second United States Artillery, July 16, 1894;

H. R. 8129. An act to amend sections 4076, 4078, and 4075 of the Revised Statutes;

H. R. 11591. An act for relief of Stanley & Patterson, and to authorize a pay director of the United States Navy to issue a duplicate check; and

H. R. 11657. An act allowing the construction of a dam across the St. Lawrence River.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 14046. An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5882. An act granting an increase of pension to Merzellah Merrill; and

S. 6030. An act authorizing the Newport Bridge, Belt and Terminal Railway Company to construct a bridge across the White River in Arkansas.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13676) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. PROCTOR, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PACIFIC CABLE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] one hour, and more if he needs it; but if he should not consume the hour I reserve whatever may remain.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I shall endeavor to consume as small a portion of the time allotted to me as may be consistent with my duty as a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of this House, that reported this bill.

This bill comes before this Committee of the Whole under very peculiar and quite extraordinary circumstances. I dare say that the able speech made by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this House [Mr. CANNON] was noted yesterday, and its significance was apparent to every gentleman on the floor of the House who listened to it. The statement of the gentleman from Illinois was to the effect that the apparent excess of appropriations at this session of Congress, exclusive of the sinking fund now in the Treasury, was over the estimated revenues for 1903 $51,925,128, and he pointed to various projects and bills now pending before the House that would readily consume that amount.

One of those references was to this bill, which will really and in fact, by the time the Government gets through with this matter, should it undertake the construction of the Pacific cable, reach quite the sum of $20,000,000. I notice in the public prints this morning that another distinguished gentleman on the Committee on Appropriations of this House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], said that up to date we had expended in this Congress $750,000,000. Now, I say, these are peculiar circumstances and surroundings in connection with the bill now under consideration.

My distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] has said to me in the past, in the discussion of this matter, "How is it possible that you can go for renomination before an Alabama constituency supporting such a monopoly as this commercial cable." I now in reply ask him this question: "How can you go before your Michigan constituency, in view of the small excess in the Treasury and in view of the immense amount of money expended in this Republican Congress (unparalleled in the history of any Congress that has sat no longer than this has) and argue in favor of an additional appropriation for such an enterprise, to be charged up against the Government, when a private company is willing to assume all the responsibility and incur all the expense and risk?" Let him answer that before his Michigan constituency. He will find himself seriously embarrassed.

There is another peculiar state of circumstances to which I wish to direct attention. We are in the midst, Mr. Chairman, of wonderful development, progress, and improvement—physical, governmental, scientific, and otherwise.

If it had been said to any gentleman on this floor twenty-five years ago that one of us could step into the adjoining cloakroom and easily talk with a man 1,000 miles away by telephone, and even identify and recognize his voice, scarcely anyone would have believed it; yet it is a fact; and I say the peculiar circumstances bearing upon a proper and thoughtful consideration of this matter that will necessarily and properly attract the attention of any gentleman who has given this question that full attention which he should, are the extracts that I have put myself to the trouble of collating in order to submit for the consideration of this House. They are in relation to this wonderful wireless telegraph system which Marconi has discovered and is now daily improving. I say that there is no man here to-day who is prepared to say to what extent that system will be a success. I read these extracts as taken from the Century Magazine; some of them as I believe are prepared by Marconi himself.

A certain commercial application of my system has already been achieved. In all seventy ships carry permanent installations, and there are over twenty land stations in Great Britain and on the continent of Europe, besides several in this country. To what further extent the system may be commercially applied is not easy to foretell. My recent successful experiments between Poldhu and St. John's, however, give great hopes of a regular trans-Atlantic wireless telegraph service in the not too distant future.

The grand scientific truth being demonstrated, Mr. Marconi now proposes to perfect the system so that it may be made applicable to commercial uses. It only requires increased power at Poldhu to transmit signals to St. John's. Following upon that, additions to the same force will permit the electric energy to be projected to the uttermost ends of the earth. Mr. Marconi hopes within a few months to be able to transact commercial telegraph business across the Atlantic. * * * Cecil Rhodes and he have already discussed "Marconigraphy" as a means of bringing together the vast distances of the South African Continent.

The system has been found of great service for naval purposes. It is installed on board 37 British war ships. In the late naval maneuvers its efficiency was demonstrated beyond question. Signals were transmitted from ship to ship over a distance of 160 miles. * * * The Italian Navy adopted it at the very first, and the Russian Navy has just announced its determination to follow the same course.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Marconi also believes that his system may become a formidable competitor against the ocean cables. * * * A trans-Atlantic cable represents an initial outlay of at least $3,000,000, besides the cost of its maintenance. A Marconi station can be built for $60,000. Three of these, bringing the two worlds into contact, will cost only $180,000, while their maintenance should be insignificant. * * * Though the first Atlantic cable was laid forty-three years ago, there are now 14 laid along the Atlantic bed, and in the whole world 1,769 telegraph cables, with a total length of almost 189,000 nautical miles, enough to girdle the earth seven times. The total value of the cables can not be easily commuted, but it is known that British capitalists have $100,000,000 invested in cable stock. * * * Cable stocks declined shortly after Marconi's success was announced, and the Anglo-American Telegraph Company restrained him from operating in Newfoundland.

The New York Commercial of Monday, April 7, stated that J. Pierpont Morgan and other financiers closely identified with him were interested in the new Wireless Telegraph Company of America. The company was incorporated under the laws of New Jersey under a capital stock of $6,150,000. Its American rights included the whole of the United States, Cuba, Porto Rico, the Danish West Indies, Alaska, Aleutian Islands, Philippine Islands, Hawaiian Islands, and all waters belonging thereto. Stations are reported to be building at Cape Cod, Cape Breton, and Tampa. Others are to be built on the Pacific coast. By means of these communications will be opened with the Orient and Russia.

In speaking of the new company, Mr. Marconi said:

The parent company is in London. It has sold no stock. It has simply sold the American rights. The two companies will work in harmony. The original London company will carry the controlling interest and cooperate in all matters with the American company. I am to receive $250,000 and 55 per cent of the stock of the new company.

Now, the question that I propound as a business proposition to this Committee of the Whole is, with the lights before us, with the pregnant probabilities that may result from these scientific investigations, are we prepared to say that we can justify ourselves by insisting that our Government under these doubtful and suggestive circumstances should own, build, and operate a cable line at a cost of fifteen or twenty millions of dollars in cash, every cent of which will become utterly useless and fruitless if Marconi's system is a success? Is it not more in accordance with common sense and fidelity to the interests of the great masses of the people whom we represent on this floor to say "No; we will not do that, but we will let this private company that has made a contract and is competent and ready, take that risk?" We can easily then defend ourselves and protect the interests of the people whom we represent. I ask you if in the ordinary affairs and transactions of life that would not be the governing principle with you. If it is, it should control our judgment in this case. Now, I will ask the Clerk to read the extracts which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5263. Any telegraph company now organized or which may hereafter be organized under the laws of any State shall have the right to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph * * * over, under, or across the navigable streams or waters of the United States.

SEC. 5266. Telegrams between the several departments of the Government and their officers and agents in their transmission over the lines of any telegraph company to which has been given the right of way, timber, or station lands from the public domain shall have priority over all other business, at such rates as the Postmaster-General shall annually fix.

SEC. 5267. The United States may, for postal, military, or other purposes, purchase all the telegraph lines, property, and effects of any or all companies acting under * * * this title, at an appraised value, to be ascertained by five competent, disinterested persons, two of whom shall be selected by the Postmaster-General of the United States, two by the company interested, and one by the four so previously selected.

SEC. 5268. Before any telegraph company shall exercise any of the powers or privileges conferred by law such company shall file their written acceptance with the Postmaster-General of the restrictions and obligations required by law.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I called attention to that post-roads act of 1866 because it is the law that governs in this case, and all the conditions and requirements that are enunciated in those statutes have been fully and literally complied with by the company proposing to build this cable. I now ask that the Clerk will read the following contract.

The Clerk read as follows:

This indenture, made this 8th day of February, in the year 1902, between the United States of America (hereinafter designated the "United States Government"), acting through the Secretary of the Treasury, of the first part, and the Commercial Pacific Cable Company, a corporation of the State of New York (hereinafter designated "said company"), of the second part, witnesseth:

That said United States Government has hereby let and rented to said company, and the said company has hereby hired and taken from the said United States Government, an office in the general post-office building at Honolulu, in the Hawaiian Islands, such office to be located in such part of the building and to be of such size as the Secretary of the Treasury may hereafter prescribe, and in consideration of the same, it/said Commercial Pacific Cable Company, hereby covenants and agrees that it will well and truly perform and comply with the following covenants and agreements with the United States of America, to wit: Said company hereby covenants and agrees—

1. To charge not exceeding 50 cents per word for the transmission of messages between San Francisco and Honolulu, and to reduce such rate to 35 cents per word within two years after the proposed cable between San Francisco and Honolulu is in operation. To charge not exceeding $1 per word for the transmission of messages between San Francisco and Manila. To charge not exceeding $1 per word for the transmission of messages between San Francisco and China. To be content to accept from the United States Government half rates for the transmission of governmental messages.

2. To complete and put in operation its submarine cable from the State of California to the Hawaiian Islands on or before January 1, 1903, and to extend and put in operation its said cable from the Hawaiian Islands to the Philippine Islands on or before January 1, 1905, it being understood that unavoidable delays due to the necessity of taking soundings and to failure of contractors to comply with their contracts shall be sufficient excuse for delay on the part of said company, provided said contracts call for the manufacture and laying of said cable to the Philippine Islands on or before January 1, 1905, excepting delays by reason of said soundings, which soundings said company hereby agrees to make within a reasonable time, if the soundings already made by the Navy of the United States are not made accessible to said company.

3. To land said cable on American soil only, it being understood, however, that in case the depth of the ocean around the island of Guam be too great to allow a cable landing on that island, the landing may be elsewhere.

4. To sell the said cable line and the property and effects of said company to said United States Government at any time at an appraised value to be ascertained by five competent disinterested persons, two of whom shall be selected by the Postmaster-General of the United States, two by the said company, and one by the four so previously selected.

5. To transmit over its said cable telegrams between the several Departments of the Government and their officers and agents at such rates as the Postmaster-General shall annually fix.

6. To give priority to said govermental telegrams over all other business.

7. Not to receive from any foreign government exclusive privileges which would prevent the establishment and operation of a cable of an American company in the jurisdiction of such foreign government.

8. Not to consolidate or amalgamate with any other line or combine therewith for the purpose of regulating rates, except to make through rates.

9. To give to the Government of the United States similar privileges to those which by law, regulation, or agreement may be granted by the company to any other government.

10. To allow the citizens of the United States to stand on an equal footing with those of any other country in the transmission of messages over the company's lines.

11. To give precedence to messages in the following order: (a) Government messages; (b) service messages; (c) general telegraphic messages.

12. To keep the line open for business daily while in working order, and subject to the foregoing order of precedence. All senders of messages shall be entitled to have them transmitted in the order in which they are received.

13. If and whenever in the opinion of the Secretary of State an emergency shall have arisen in which it is expedient for the public service that the United States Government shall have control over the transmission of messages by the company's cable, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of State, by warrant under his hand, to direct and cause the company's cable and plant, or any part thereof, to be taken possession of in the name and on behalf of the United States Government, and to be used for the United States Government's service, and subject thereto for such ordinary service as to the said Secretary of State may seem fit, and in that event any person authorized by the said Secretary of State may enter upon the offices and plant of the company, or any of them, and take possession thereof, and use the same as aforesaid.

The Secretary of State may, when he considers such an emergency as aforesaid to have arisen, instead of taking possession of the offices, cable, and plant of the company, or any of them, direct and authorize such persons as he may think fit to assume the control of the transmission of messages by the company's cable, either wholly or partly, and in such manner as he may direct; and such persons may enter upon the company's premises accordingly, or the Secretary of State may direct the company to submit to him or any person authorized by him all telegrams tendered for transmission or arriving by the company's cable, or any class or classes of such telegrams, and to stop or delay the transmission of any telegrams, or deliver the same to him or his agent, and generally to obey all such directions with reference to the transmission of telegrams as the Secretary of State may prescribe, and the company shall obey and conform to all such directions.

In any such case as aforesaid, if the company show that during the exercise of any of the powers aforesaid their receipts from the cable, with respect to which the said powers have been exercised, have been less than their receipts from the same source during a corresponding period on the average of the last three years, the United States Government shall pay to the company as compensation for any loss of profit sustained by the company by reason of the exercise by the Secretary of State of any of the powers hereby reserved, such sum as may be settled between the Secretary of State and the company by agreement, or, in case of difference, may be determined by arbitration, provided always that no such compensation as aforesaid shall be paid; if and so far as the powers hereby reserved to the Secretary of State are exercised for the purpose of preventing direct communication with any of the United States Government's enemies, and save with the consent of the Secretary of State, no such compensation shall be paid; if and so far as the powers aforesaid are exercised for the purpose of preventing indirect or supposed communication with any of the United States Government's enemies or of protecting the interests of the United States Government under the apprehension of impending war.

In estimating such compensation as in the last subclause provided, the arbitrator shall take into account all the circumstances of the case, including not only any such loss as aforesaid, but also any additional profit accruing to the company (whether from the use of the cable so taken possession of or controlled or from any other cables used by them) from the emergency which gave rise to the exercise of the powers aforesaid. And as regards the cable with respect to which the said powers have been exercised the receipts of the company during a period corresponding to that of the exercise of the said powers on the average of the last three years shall be deemed to be the receipts which the company would have taken during the period of the exercise of the said powers had the powers not been exercised.

And said company hereby covenants and agrees that it will vacate the said office at any time upon notice from the Treasury Department, and that in the meantime and until said notice said Commercial Pacific Cable Company will keep the same in good order and repair, without expense or cost to the Secretary of the Treasury.

And said company hereby covenants to and with the United States of America that the United States of America may enforce the above obligations, and each and all of them, by summary action of the Army or Navy or by a bill of injunction to be filed in any court of competent jurisdiction, or by a suit for damages, or by any of said remedies, as the United States of America may deem best.

In witness whereof said Commercial Pacific Cable Company has caused these presents to be executed by its vice president and its seal to be attached by its secretary, and the Secretary of the Treasury has hereunto signed his name the day and year first above written.

[SEAL.] COMMERCIAL PACIFIC CABLE COMPANY,
By GEO. G. WARD, Vice-President.

Attest: ALBERT BECK, Secretary.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I have had read the post-roads act and the contract, the reading of which has just been concluded, to establish clearly and distinctly the foundation upon which this whole case rests. I know that it is contended in some cases that the post-roads act of 1866 does not apply, but by reading that act any gentleman who will carefully scan its meaning will see that it includes the lines across the waters of our Government. It is contended that it does not apply to cables, but that it embraces only land telegrams. Then, if it does not do that, if it does not apply, this private company, the Commercial Pacific Cable Company, has voluntarily assumed and entered into these obligations with the Government, and no man would contend for a moment that the Government, with all of its powers, could not enforce it. You will notice in that contract one remarkable feature, and it is that the Government of the United States can vacate that contract at any time it pleases, but the same privilege is not extended to this private company. Now, I have listened, Mr. Chairman, to a good deal in the way and nature of patriotic pyrotechnics on this floor. Why, my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] is not really in his natural and proper rôle, the one that nature generously gave him, unless he is either "dramatic or in some instances quite tragic."

Whenever this cable question comes up he sends out what might be commonly called an "autobiography of himself" to correspondents in advance of his speech. Who prepares that I will not say. That was done in the case of the speech he made on the floor of the House some months since. I hold in my hand a similar speech, written upon "yellow paper," sent out before he took the floor upon this subject, and I have a right to use it, because it was intended for the public. The only different "earmarks" appearing upon this paper from those that I have seen of his so sent out to willing correspondents in the former discussions of this bill is this memoranda:

To be released when CORLISS speaks.

Now, how it got out of its prison, how it escaped from its confinement, who released it, who gave it liberty, I am not prepared to say. At least it is here in my possession, and possession is nine points in the law. In this "advance copy" of his speech my friend takes occasion to talk a great deal about "American manufactures and American ships and American-made cables." That is all right and proper in its place. I have no comment to make upon that, and if I did my motives might be misconstrued; but addressed under these circumstances to the reasoning capacity and the common sense of this House, on a mere business proposition, I say that it ought not to have any force or effect. Why, I do not believe in charging that Mr. Mackay "stole" anything. I am told by gentlemen from California that Mr. Mackay is a man of exceptionally good character. Is there any necessity, in the discussion of this business proposition, to say that any man would "steal" anything? It is unbecoming and ought and will be properly rebuked by this House.

Mr. CORLISS—

I read now from this yellow paper—

dramatically denounced private monopolies of this character and vehemently declared that the private interest now seeking to steal this public franchise was a gigantic octopus, seeking to fasten its tentacles upon American soil for the purpose of sucking the lifeblood from the arteries of human energy, trade, and commerce.

There is not a gentleman on the floor of this House who would not recognize that sentence as properly emanating from and belonging to my friend from Michigan. Here is another one of these dramatic scenes described in this advance yellow circular sheet. This, you must remember, is a paper or speech with singularly complimentary editorial comments that was handed out to the correspondents in advance of the delivery of the speech. I am not saying that a member of Congress has not the right to do that, and no one would say that I have not the right to comment upon it when it is given to the public. Listen to this, as I find it in that advance sheet:

God Almighty, declaimed Mr. CORLISS in conclusion, with dramatic emphasis, seemed to be working in a mysterious way to save the people of the United States from the clutch of this monopoly by breaking the single cable communication between Hongkong and Manila on June 2.

Here we are at this very moment—with 8,000,000 of people in the Philippines, our military and civil interests without communication, severed from all the world, and the battle ships of our Navy being used as dispatch boats to carry communications to our people.

He said—

I beg, in connection with that, to read what the President of the United States said on a subject related to this only this morning, as published in the Washington Post:

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to thank you for your kind letter of the 31st ultimo, inclosing a memorial of the American Unitarian Association, passed at their annual meeting on May 22, 1902. I am happy to be able to say that the bill which has just passed the Senate will, if enacted into law, enable us to proceed even more rapidly and efficiently than hitherto along the lines of securing peace, prosperity, and personal liberty to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands. There is now almost no "policy of coercion" in the islands, because the insurrection has been so entirely overcome that, save in a very few places peace, and with peace the "policy of conciliation and good will," obtain throughout the Philippines. There has never been any coercion save such as was absolutely inevitable in putting a stop to an armed attack upon the sovereignty of the United States, which in its last stages became mere brigandage.

With great regard, and assuring you of my hearty sympathy with the purpose set forth in your letter and actuating the members of the American Unitarian Association as regards peace and justice in the Philippines, I am,

Very truly, yours,

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

I read that communication in connection with the "dramatic expression" of my friend from Michigan invoking the cooperation and aid of this House in passing this bill because and on the ground that the building of the cable is alleged to be a military necessity. But the President of the United States says that peace has been restored there; that prosperity is following rapidly in its footsteps. Why, then, should we pass a bill of this kind, fastening upon the Government the charge of $20,000,000 to build a cable for military purposes when the Chief Executive of our country says that peace reigns in the Philippines?

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the real proposition in this case? I believe there are only two. One is Government ownership and the other is private ownership. I understand from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] that an amendment will be offered to this bill—what is known as the Hale bill—providing substantially the very conditions that have been read in that contract, save probably one. I submit that one exception to the business intelligence of this House. It is right and proper that the Postmaster-General shall fix the rates at which the Government messages shall be carried. That is all right. That is in our contract. But listen to this other condition:

And such further conditions and terms as the President may deem proper.

That is the Hale bill, and the objection we make to it is this: I put to you the proposition, if you were about to invest $12,000,000 under a contract that specified the terms, would you intrust that $12,000,000 in the hands of any one single man, it matters not how honorable, how intelligent, how high his position might be in the Government, when he has to prescribe "such further conditions and terms as he may deem proper?"

I say there is not a business man in this House that would invest that amount of money on such uncertain and unsafe conditions and terms as that. That amendment or substitute means, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that no cable will be built from the United States to Manila. I am in favor of a cable, and I believe that the universal sentiment among the members of this House is in favor of building a cable in one way or another, but as business men would you prescribe such terms as those—as the President may hereafter prescribe? I would be unwilling to delegate such powers to the President. Why, that would put it in his power to destroy the capital invested.

Now, I say these are the two propositions that are before this House, and only these. Now, what is this proposition or contract that the Clerk has read. You have heard the contract read. You can not take the most competent and qualified attorney representing the interests of the Government to-day and draw a contract more in favor of the Government and that guards, protects, and safeguards its interest more than that contract does. In addition to that this company has done an extraordinary thing, which I will take occasion to mention. It has received from the manufacturers in England a guaranty of two years for the safe working of the cable when it is laid.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will you allow me a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Suppose the bill that is now pending be defeated, is it the opinion of the gentleman that that contract that he has read is of a character that could be enforced by the Government against this company?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Thoroughly so.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is the consideration enough on behalf of the Government of the United States to make it a valid binding contract in all of its provisions?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; the consideration under the law, I think, would be the benefit of the people. That would be the benefit coming from a governmental standpoint.

Mr. HOPKINS. Could it be enforced against the company itself?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I think so, beyond question.

Mr. CORLISS. Let me ask my friend a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am going to treat the gentleman differently from the manner in which you treated me. I am going to treat him in the Bible way, that "you should do unto others as you would have others do unto you." I asked you a question while you had the floor and you declined to yield.

Mr. CORLISS. If you do not want to consent, I will not insist.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Go along and ask your question, although you would not allow me to interrupt you.

Mr. CORLISS. I do so because the gentleman from Illinois is not as familiar with the facts in this matter as I am. Is not it true that the contract that you have read was submitted to the Attorney-General, and the Attorney-General and the President and no other executive officer has any authority to act for the Government, and that there is no interest and no consideration proposed in it, and therefore it is null and void? Is not that true?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not so understand.

Mr. CORLISS. It is a question of fact.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Is it not a fact, I will put the question to my friend, that you went before the Committee on the Judiciary asking for an injunction in this matter, and that they refused to grant it?

Mr. CORLISS. On the contrary, I asked the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate a charge that I made under the antitrust law, and they said that that was for the Attorney-General. That is the fact in the matter of that investigation. But I say to my friend, and I ask him in all fairness as to this contract that he has read, if it was not submitted to the Attorney-General and the Attorney-General has it at his Department now. Is that not true?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Are you through?

Mr. CORLISS. Is not that true?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am going to answer you, although you did not treat me with courtesy and allow me to ask you a question on yesterday when you had an hour of time.

Mr. CORLISS. I want to be fair with you.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I want to be fair, and I want to answer your question, but not in the way in which you may dictate it.

Mr. CORLISS. I do not want to dictate anything. Is it not true that the Attorney-General has declined to consider that contract, that the President has declined to consider that contract, because they have no power to act?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. You are taking up my time and making another speech, and you have already spoken an hour and a half. My understanding of that is this: That the Attorney-General and other officers have refused to interfere in this matter at all. That is what I understand.

Mr. CORLISS. That is right.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Whether the contract was merely submitted to these officers and they declined to act on it at all is an immaterial matter, for this Commercial Pacific Cable Company, proceeding under the post roads act of 1866, have entered into a contract under that law and filed it according to that law, and they are manufacturing and really building that cable. That is what they are doing.

I will also say that this cable company that is making this cable over in England guarantees it for two years. There is not a company that ever laid a cable or ever made a cable to be laid that has ever guaranteed it over thirty days. That is the difference you get in it. Now, what the situation is I started to say when my distinguished friend from Michigan interrupted me. Why, it is simply this: Here is a proposition, plain, unvarnished, and easily understood, that this Government is to engage in the cable business, build and own, operate, and use a Government cable from the coast of California to Manila, a distance of 8,000 miles, and the estimate made by those that seem best informed before the committee was that its cost would not fall below $12,000,000, and more likely fifteen millions. It will cost $1,500,000 per year for operating expenses. That is the proof before the committee, and the annual income is only $150,000. That is the annual income that has been estimated.

Now, what is it on the other hand? The Commercial Cable Company, a private enterprise controlled by skillful men, men that have laid over 13,000 miles of cable, men that possess that knack that Admiral Bradford well described before the committee, to build these cables—this company, headed by John W. Mackay proposes, without one dollar of subsidy or aid from the Government of the United States, to build, operate, and maintain this cable line from the coast of California to Manila, in the Philippine Islands, by the 1st of January, 1905—a distance of more than 8,000 miles—in accordance with the terms expressed in their contract, under which every conceivable interest of the Government is carefully guarded and protected. The evidence was shown to you yesterday in the paper I submitted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] who these subscribers were, and there were only two Englishmen or foreigners among them, and the balance, or a large majority, were Americans.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. THAYER. I heard the gentleman say that the evidence before the committee was that it was demonstrated that it would cost a million and a half dollars per annum to maintain this cable. I would like to ask the gentleman upon what basis that estimate is made?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not know. I took what the experienced men who were witnesses said before the committee. I have not studied cable manufacture. I am not an expert, but I have learned, as a lawyer, to accept the testimony of credible witnesses, and believe men unless the contrary is shown.

Now, what else is shown about this company, Mr. Chairman? Read the testimony; it is very voluminous; but the prevailing opinion of men who had knowledge and experience and judgment was that there would have to be a duplicate cable in certain contingencies. Why? Because the experience of the world shows that the cables break frequently, and in one instance where a break occurred it took eleven months to repair it, and it cost $500,000 to do it. Now, we are laying ourselves liable to all these things when we venture on Government ownership. Is it not a reasonable proposition that if this Government needs that cable, if there is any necessity for it—and surely, from what the President has said, there is no need of it at present, not from a military standpoint—let them go along and lay the cable? The company asks no subsidy—no aid from the Government. Let them take all the risk of breakage, all the risk of delays, and then, according to this contract, after it is laid, when the Government wants a cable and thinks it needs it, let it do the way we would do in a private affair, and, according to the contract, buy it of them at its appraised value.

Why, gentlemen, I do not see how a business proposition could be made stronger than the mere statement of these facts. That is the condition and those are the terms—take it and buy it. And if war arises, if any emergency occurs so as to make it necessary, let the Secretary of State take possession of the cable and rent it or use it for the Government temporarily and pay what is a fair rental for it. And in addition to that, the Postmaster-General prescribes the rates. What fairer proposition could be made? The Government is protected in every respect.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Does the Government prescribe any rate except for Government messages?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; not specifically.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then commerce would have no relief?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Oh, commerce has got that protection that underlies everything relating to commerce, competition.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is there any competition now?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Not right now; no.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Does the gentleman think there will be?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention——

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If it will not disturb the gentleman, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Well?

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Would the gentleman be in favor of putting the rates in the bill so that we might know what it would cost?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That might be a good thing to do.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Would the gentleman be in favor of it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; anything, if it can be done consistently with all interest to the company and the people, I would favor it. I am not advocating this matter of private ownership from anything except the very best interests of the public good. I see no objection to the proposition of the gentleman; but I was about, Mr. Chairman, to call attention to a point my friend the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] labored most earnestly upon. I can not undertake to follow him in all these matters, but in reference to the concession in the Philippine Islands made to other cable companies prior to the Spanish-American war it is a strange thing to me that when he referred to the Attorney-General's opinions he did not get the latest opinion of the Attorney-General upon this direct question. I have it right here before me, and I want to call special attention to it. The gentleman read an opinion yesterday about Cuba, and stated that it was similar in principle to this, but I have the former Attorney-General's (Mr. Griggs's) opinion upon the very question involved in this bill, and it is strange that the gentleman from Michigan did not find it.

It would be idle for me to follow the argument of the gentleman from Michigan on the question, equities, and rights involved in certain concessions granted by Spain to certain cable companies in the Philippines. The same questions arose in Cuba and they were properly referred by Secretary of State to the permanent Government now established in Cuba. But, fortunately for the proper consideration of this important matter, all these questions, complications, and other Spanish rights in the Philippine Islands have been recently considered and passed on by the Attorney-General. Then why waste the time of this House? I know that the Eastern Extension Company probably controls a greater length in nautical miles of cable lines than any other company in the world. It has connections and through tariff rates and communicates with the world. It would be folly not to make these connections. The Commercial Pacific Cable Company has been negotiating for through rates with the Eastern Commercial Cable Company. It has no such right or connection or traffic arrangement with that foreign company that would exclude any other company from the same privileges and enjoyments. I will read only an extract from the opinion of the Attorney-General. It is to be found in the Opinions of the Attorneys-General, volume 23, page —.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, July 27, 1900.

The concession of the railroad company is similar to that of the cable companies, and I therefore refer to the opinion of the Secretary of War as throwing light upon your inquiries. In accordance with the views and for the reasons therein explained, I am of the opinion that the contracts of concession of the Cuban Submarine Telegraph Company, concerning cable from Habana to Santiago and from Habana to Manzanillo, also the three concessions to the Eastern Extension, Australasia and China Telegraph Company, Limited, concerning cables from Hongkong to Bolinao and from Bolinao to Manila and three cables from Luzon to Panay, Negros, and Cebu islands are not binding as contracts on the United States, Cuba, the Philippines, or other government replacing Spain.

Now, what becomes of all that elaborate legal "card-house" superstructure that the gentleman from Michigan constructed yesterday, apparently so thoroughly to his own satisfaction, when talking about the concessions that created this wonderful monopoly? This opinion has been ratified by the present Attorney-General, the Hon. Mr. Knox. I will not read the whole opinion of Mr. Knox. It is on page 453, same book:

I have examined the reasoning of my predecessor, and do not find it incorrect; neither do I think it necessary to give reasons in addition to those already carefully set forth by him.

And I say to this Committee of the Whole now, that the argument made by the gentleman from Michigan on all this magnified question of concessions has just about as much foundation in truth and in fact as the arguments he has made about the status of Great Britain's cables.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. As I understand it, the concession to the Eastern Extension Company, giving it and another company the privilege to build in the Philippine Islands, is declared by the Attorney-General not to be binding on the United States Government. Is that the effect of the opinion?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; that is the effect of it.

Mr. MANN. If that is the case, would the gentleman be of the opinion that a similar concession granted by China would be held to be binding in international law?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. A similar concession granted by China or granted by this Government would not apply in the case I have just read.

Mr. MANN. Well, as I understand it, the Eastern Extension Company claims that it has the sole right to land a cable on Chinese shores, and that is one of the main arguments in favor of the Commercial Pacific Company building a cable, it having made arrangements with the Eastern Extension Company. Now, if the concession of the Spanish Government to the Eastern Extension Company for the sole privilege is not good, would not the same reasoning prove that the other concession would not be good?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do not think that I catch the whole purport of your question. I believe that Mr. Griggs and Mr. Knox have stated the law in this case. A similar concession granted by China to the cable company would occupy entirely a different status from the concession granted by Spain in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with the gentleman from Alabama about that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. What else is there in this question? The concessions granted by Spain on the Philippine Islands are not binding on our Government. China is not under our control. You may wander off and put problematic questions to me——

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman will concede that our committee was substantially all agreed that that concession was not binding upon the Government.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Well, I must frankly say that I do not recall what the committee did think about that. I have not charged my mind particularly with matters not acted upon by the committee, and I do not know what they think. I simply and politely say that I am not prepared to speak about what each member of the committee thought.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to some other facts connected with this matter. This question was before Congress, I believe, in the Fifty-sixth Congress; and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that had the question under consideration reported against this kind of a bill, and in support of that position made this statement—minority report it is:

The following disadvantages of a Government cable have occurred to the committee, and in the opinion of the committee they are controlling and justify the conclusions now arrived at:

1. The great first cost of establishing a Government trans-Pacific cable system—that is, $15,000,000.
2. The comparatively great annual cost of a Government cable, estimated at $1,500,000.
3. The inability of the United States Government to land and operate a Government-owned cable either in Japan or China.
4. That as a Government cable would not obtain traffic to and from China and Japan, its income would be limited to traffic to and from the Philippines and Hawaiian Islands, which at an outside estimate would not exceed $150,000 annually, while the annual expense would be $1,500,000.
5. That, assuming that a Government cable could reach China and Japan and secure all the business which a private company might develop, still, if the experience of American cable companies in Central and South America is repeated in the Philippines, China, and Japan, as seems probable, 90 per cent of the whole telegraph traffic will be carried on by less than 400 customers, 300 of whom will be foreigners and the balance inhabitants of the United States; so that the proposition to establish a Government cable system would mean a tax amounting to an outlay of $15,000,000 and a large annual expense for the benefit of only 100 Americans and 300 foreign firms and corporations.

That is what they are asking you to do in the passage of this bill, to spend $15,000,000 for the benefit of 300 foreigners and 100 American-born citizens.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. When was that report made?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. In the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. For what other purpose would foreigners use our cable than to communicate with our people in the interests of commerce?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Oh, I can not tell what a man is going to use a cable for, nor you can not either.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is it not manifest that it would be used only in our commercial relations?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That may be. I think it would be so. But I am reading just what this committee said about it. They thought over it and deliberated about it, and I do not know whether you agreed with them at that time or not; but they thought over it, and this is the result of their opinion and conclusion, that we would be expending $15,000,000 on the part of this Government to benefit 300 Englishmen and 100 Americans. Now, where is my friend from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] when he talks so much about foreign English capital and capitalists?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman is aware that the committee which reported that also reported in favor of spending $300,000 a year for twenty years to benefit these 100 American citizens, and that some of us did not agree with them or with that idea?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The gentleman refers to the subsidy business?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Well, I am opposed to the subsidy myself.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman gives only a portion of the reasoning of the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am reading what practically bears on this economic question, as to whether the Government should own, build, and operate this Pacific cable, and I am not talking about the subsidy of $300,000 or $350,000 or $400,000 a year. I am talking about the practical proposition we have to pass upon as an economic business question. Is it right and proper that this Government should invest $15,000,000 in these uncertainties, when a private company, full of enterprise and full of vigor and full of skill and energy, perfectly competent, stands willing and ready to give every guaranty and safeguard that the Government could ask and go forward and build that cable within the terms prescribed in their contract? That is the question.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to take the gentleman's time——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman read from the committee report in the Fifty-sixth Congress that it would be an annual expense of $1,500,000 to maintain and operate the cable. May I ask the gentleman whether he thinks that it would cost anywhere near that sum for a private company to operate the cable?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I believe in all Government enterprises—and I think the gentleman must have had the same experience and made the same observation—it costs the Government more in all instances than it costs individuals.

Mr. MANN. Well, of course the gentleman knows that the operation of a cable is a very simple matter. There are not very many people who can possibly be employed in operating a cable. Now, the committee reported in the last Congress that it would cost a million and a half dollars, and they reported at the same time that the utmost amount of receipts that could possibly be expected from the cable, counting the increased business, was $583,000. If the gentleman follows the same reasoning, he will find it hard to establish a reason now for a private company to build the cable.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am not engaged in the business to-day of providing the ways and means for this private company to build this cable. They want to build it, and the matter of expense belongs to them, not me. I am engaged in the common-sense business proposition of passing upon this question as to whether it is to the interests of the Government to own and operate this cable or whether we should allow a private company to do it. That is all of it.

The CHAIRMAN. I would state that the hour granted to the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman ten minutes more on condition that he quit allowing the other side to use his time for speeches.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is more courteous than usual.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am as courteous as the gentleman from Michigan was yesterday.

Mr. MANN. Less courteous than any other member of the House or himself at any other time. The gentleman is the last man in the House that I supposed would make a break like that.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is not a break. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] has been speaking for three months here.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, in answer to all that the gentleman from Michigan said yesterday about what Great Britain had done, I am fortunately in possession of one of the most important books that I could possibly submit to the consideration of this House—England's Blue Book. It is the report made on March 26, 1902, of the Inter-Departmental Commission on Cable Communications, appointed by the Parliament of Great Britain to investigate the relations between cable companies and the Government, and the future policy which the Government should pursue. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] has voluminously and earnestly pointed us to the example and policy of Great Britain. By his own words he stands condemned. I first quote from the speech of the gentleman of Michigan delivered on the floor of the House on yesterday:

Great Britain, after eight years, concluded to break down the monopoly possessed by an English corporation, the Eastern Cable Extension Company—a corporation that for years has monopolized all this territory. When England found that she was powerless to direct the affairs of this cable company in time of war she appointed a committee and finally, after years of discussion and investigation, ordered this cable laid from Vancouver by way of the Fiji and Fanning islands to New Zealand and Australia.

That was the first break in the monopoly of the corporation to which I refer. That was the cause of the cutting down of the rate to our Government from $2.25 per word to $1.66 per word. It was not done by Mr. Mackay or his influence. Great Britain is a Government that looks into the future. She sets her stakes a hundred years in advance and her statesmen never falter in their onward march, in their tenacity and courage, looking toward her mastery of the sea. The only menace to Great Britain at the present time for the supremacy of the sea is the United States.

We must follow her example or surrender the possibilities of the future. Great Britain has adopted submarine cable as a part of her military power. She paid $60,000,000 in one lump to buy cables that were owned by private companies. She operates to-day 20,000 miles of submarine cables, besides the one that she is building through the Pacific. I have that on authority of General Greely, who certified to the facts.

It will be noted that the gentleman from Michigan says: "We must follow her [Great Britain's] example or surrender the possibilities of the future." She looks into the future and "sets her stakes one hundred years ahead." It is quite probable, I fear, that the testimony of the able commission that made this recent report to the English Government will not be accepted by the gentleman from Michigan:

We are strongly opposed to any scheme for the general purchase of private cables by the State. * * *

It is clear that the operation suggested is one of serious magnitude, even when a reduction is made for the reserve funds in the hands of the companies. Experience shows that the State does not obtain favorable terms for the transfer of property to itself, and that when the transfer is made, there is constant pressure for an increase in the wages of the working staff and for an indefinite reduction in rates. These objections would not be fatal if it were established that submarine cables would be more efficiently managed by the State than by private companies; but no serious attempt has been made to prove this point, and we ourselves are decidedly of a contrary opinion. Many of the cables touch on foreign territory, and it is evident that serious difficulty might arise if the British Government endeavored to work them by its own operators.

As regards the future, we think that the normal policy of this country should be to encourage "free trade in cables," and that departures should only be made from it where strong reasons of national interests exist. We do not desire to discuss the general question how far it is the function of a government to compensate private industries, by subsidies or countervailing duties, for the assistance rendered to their rivals by a foreign state. The case of cable messages is not altogether analogous to that of ordinary commodities. A strategic element enters into the question. We are of opinion that the ruling consideration in such cases must be the interests of the country as a whole; and we think that British companies should not be assisted at the cost of the general taxpayer, or by the sacrifice of strategic advantages to the country at large, unless such assistance is required for the preservation of some national interest—e. g., for the maintenance of a strategic line. (P. 24).

The gentleman from Michigan would have the House believe that Great Britain was really hostile to her private cable companies. This is what the English commission has to say on that subject:

67. We feel it unnecessary to add, on our behalf, any further narrative of the companies' history. Speaking generally, the impression left upon our mind is twofold. We think that they have rendered great service, commercially and strategically, to British interests. With a view, primarily, to their own revenue, but to the great incidental advantage of this country they built up a vast system of cable communications under British management. They obtained concessions from foreign governments and understandings with foreign companies which the Imperial Government could never have secured, and through their efforts submarine telegraphy remained, for the first thirty years of its existence, almost exclusively in British hands. (P. 25.)

Great Britain imposes upon her private cable companies terms similar to the obligations and terms expressed in the contract of the Commercial Pacific Cable Company:

That the line shall be worked subject to the provisions and regulations of the International Telegraph Convention. That the staff shall be composed of competent officers, being British subjects. That the rates charged to the public shall not exceed a specified maximum, and that imperial and colonial government messages shall have priority and be sent at half rates.

That in case of war, rebellion, or other emergency the Government shall have power to take possession of and work the line on its own account for so long as it shall see fit, paying compensation. (P. 23.)

I read again from the same book, from the report of the same commission:

We desire at the outset to say—

Now, I will remark that this bill prescribes the rate of 50 cents a word from San Francisco to Manila and to the Orient—

We desire at the outset to say that we regard all proposals for a very large reduction in existing rates, such as Mr. Henniker Heaton's suggestion of a 1 pence rate to America and Australia (QQ. 2212 and 2245) as quite impracticable. There is little analogy between the case of submarine cables and that (for example) of the penny post. The laying, working, and maintenance of a cable requires the expenditure of a definite and substantial amount of capital, and the carrying capacity secured in return is limited. It must not always be assumed that an increase of traffic is necessarily a benefit to the company concerned. So long as the cable is not worked to its full capacity increase of traffic, unless accompanied by a heavy increase in working expenses, implies an increase in net revenue; but when the increase is so great as to necessitate the laying of a new cable the case is different, and it will be obvious that, at a certain point, a limit is reached beyond which reductions in rates can not possibly be made. Even when the cables of a company are fully occupied messages can not be carried below a rate which will provide for interest on capital, expenses of working, maintenance, and so on. The limit will rise or fall with variations in the cost of materials, etc., and it will be lowered by any new telegraphic discovery or by improvements in methods of working; but at any given moment it is constant. (P. 35.)

The gentleman from Michigan repeats and reasserts a statement that really has no foundation in fact. He has iterated and reiterated so often that Great Britain operates 20,000 miles of submarine cable besides the one she is building in the Pacific. I reproduce the official statement printed in the hearings before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce January 9, 1900, in which a summary is given of the cables owned by the nations of the world:

Country.	Number of cables.	Length of cables in nautical miles.	Average length per cable in nautical miles.
Australia	41	214	5.20
Belgium	2	55	27.50
Denmark	73	235	3.20
France	54	5,035	93.24
Germany	58	2,225	34.36
Great Britain and Ireland	135	1,989	14.74
Greece	47	55	1.17
Holland	24	62	2.58
Italy	39	1,061	27.21
Norway	325	324	.99
Portugal	4	115	28.75
Russia	9	231	25.66
Spain	15	1,744	116.26
Sweden	14	90	6.85
Switzerland	2	10	5
Turkey	23	344	14.95
Argentina and Brazil	49	119	2.43
Australia and New Zealand	31	345	11.13
Bahama Islands	1	213	213
British America	1	200	200
British India (Indo-European telegraph department)	111	1,919	17.28
China	2	113	56.50
Cochin China and Tonkin	2	774	387
Japan	70	1,508	21.54
Macao	1	2	1
Nouvelle Caledonie	1	1	1
Netherlands Indies	7	891	127.28
Senegal, Africa-Dakar to Goree Island	1	3	3
Total	1,142	19,883	17.41

It is observed from the above table that Great Britain has 135 cables of a total length of 1,989 miles, or an average length of 14.74 miles. They are all channel or shore lines, and form part of her postal system.

A statement showing in detail the cables owned by private enterprise and by governments is given in the same report, pp. 42–48:

The total length of cables owned by governments is 19,883 miles.

The total length of cables owned by private enterprise is 146,419 miles.

And this report, Mr. Chairman, shows the conditions that Great Britain put upon the cables. The gentleman from Michigan

[Mr. CORLISS] said that Great Britain owned a majority of the stock. I say to you to-day that Great Britain, from the information that I have, does not own a dollar of stock in any of the cables. There is no stock; and in the short channel cables that pass from Great Britain to France it is a known fact that no stock was issued and that they divided their ownership in the middle of the channel, so jealous were they of power and authority, Great Britain on one side and France on the other.

And this commission states absolutely that it is not to the interest of Great Britain in the future to own the submarine cables.

Now, one more thing that I will read. There was a great deal said about a cable altogether American, and that Mr. Mackay or the Commercial Cable Company would not build an all-American cable because it had been developed by Admiral Bradford's survey around Guam where the water is 6 miles deep, the deepest in the world, that possibly a cable could not be laid there; but Admiral Bradford has completed his survey, and he has marked out the course, and here is a letter that I have the privilege of reading, that was addressed to the chairman of the committee [Mr. HEPBURN] which says:

COMMERCIAL PACIFIC CABLE COMPANY,
EXECUTIVE OFFICE, POSTAL TELEGRAPH BUILDING,
253 Broadway, New York, June h, 1902.

Hon. WILLIAM P. HEPBURN,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: My cable engineer, Mr. Cuttriss, through your kind offices and the courtesy of Mr. Moody, the Secretary of the Navy, and of Admiral Bradford, has been allowed to examine the charts of soundings on file in the Navy Department, showing that it is feasible to land a submarine cable on the island of Guam in the Pacific Ocean. Mr. Cuttriss has just telegraphed me that these soundings show that such a landing is practicable. This removes the only doubt as to the feasibility of an all-American cable from San Francisco to Manila, and I write this letter to you to state positively that the submarine cable, which the Commercial Pacific Cable Company has agreed to construct, lay, and operate from San Francisco to Manila, will be an all-American cable and will not touch on any foreign island or territory whatsoever. I give you my personal assurance to that effect. The first section of this cable will be in operation in November, 1902, and we expect to be able to arrange for the remaining sections to be completed and opened for traffic during the year 1904.

Yours, very truly, JOHN W. MACKAY, President.

Now, there is not a man who knows that gentleman, as I am told, who does not believe absolutely that he will carry out the assurances contained in this letter. And yet it was lustily and tauntingly said that he would not build an all-American cable.

I shall, Mr. Chairman, in the time that I have left, refer to a few other matters concerning this bill. A great deal has been said on the subject of American labor. I am as much in sympathy with American labor as you or anyone else is; but when we go to talking about having an American-made cable carried by American ships under the American flag, all that is for the kind and good purpose of making our patriotism profitable. It is not business. We are here to consider it as a business proposition. Let us find out how much labor enters into the question of making this cable. Twelve per cent of it is the cost of labor and 88 per cent is the cost of material. Fifty per cent of that material consists of gutta-percha, a product coming from distant British islands, that pays 35 per cent tariff to come into this country, and the same product goes into England free, where the cable is made which is contracted for by this Commercial Cable Company. There is so much for copper and so much for jute that goes as a wrapper of the wire. These are facts that gentlemen who talk about protecting labor in this country ought to consider in connection with this matter.

Is it possible that the doctrine of protection can be carried so far as to drive men from the profits and emoluments of private enterprise? I can understand how a Republican can, consistently with the theory of protection and the extending of governmental functions, harmonize a Government cable with the principles of his party, but it is incomprehensible to me to see how a Democrat can do so. The time-honored policy of our party is in favor of economy and the cutting down of Government expenses. This is an inexcusable and extravagant expenditure of public money. It invades the domain of private enterprise.

This bill provides for the payment of 10 per cent advance to the American manufacturer of ocean cables. This is a false pretense. It is a pretended bounty. It is an appeal to the high-tariff policy and sentiments of the Republican party. In such a question as this there should be no politics. This matter of laying a Pacific cable is a hazardous experiment from a pecuniary standpoint. It is a long distance and through deep and unknown waters. I do not hesitate to say that there is not to-day an American company qualified to manufacture cable wire demanded by the importance of this route. The highest degree of skill and the best and finest material is demanded. We have neither in the United States. Great Britain has both. If this be true, then we should not hesitate as to our choice. I repeat that this cable can not be manufactured in our country; but we can not afford to experiment on this matter. The most suitable information on the question as to where the cable should be manufactured is found in the voluminous evidence submitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I submit the statement of Admiral Bradford and others. They are certainly competent to advise us on such a subject.

Statement of Admiral Bradford, Chief of the Bureau of Equipment, Navy Department.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that the Signal Corps of the Army, with such assistance as they might have from the Navy, have, or could readily have, the facilities for laying this cable?

Admiral BRADFORD. I have no doubt of it, sir. I would advocate, however, that the cable be made and laid by the most experienced cable companies in the world. This is too important and too expensive a job to confide to amateurs. I have always advocated an English made and laid cable, for the reason that the British companies have the experience of the world in this work.

Mr. MANN. In your judgment, it would be safe to acquire or purchase a cable laid by an American company?

Admiral BRADFORD. I do not recommend it, because any company in a work of such magnitude as a cable from the Pacific coast to the Philippines should have previous experience, and there are no American companies with much experience in making long deep-sea cables. On short lines in shallow water American companies might perhaps do satisfactory work.

Mr. CORLISS. Would you not be willing to take the guaranty of a responsible American manufacturer who claimed to have the skill and experience and ability necessary to lay a cable, and with sufficient bond, to lay the cable, and with satisfactory guaranty, say, for three years?

Admiral BRADFORD. Not when I know that there is no company in the United States with experience in making and laying deep-sea cables.

Mr. CORLISS. A gentleman stood here representing an American manufacturing institution and told this committee that he had a plant already in existence with a capacity of 240 miles a month of the best cable in the world.

Admiral BRADFORD. I know of no such plant nor of any company with the necessary experience to do the work under consideration.

Mr. CORLISS. He claims that he has that experience and that he has the best experts in the world in his employ.

Admiral BRADFORD. I do not see any advantage in encouraging the manufacture of submarine cables in this country unless we are going to continue laying them. If we could assure ourselves of a large part of the world's business in cable making and laying, it might be an advantage.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I said they insisted that that proviso should be put in this bill, that none but American manufacturers of cable should be allowed to bid, and that all foreign companies should be excluded. You would not favor that?

Admiral BRADFORD. I would not. If necessary to assist American manufacturers of cables, I should prefer to do it in some other manner. This undertaking is of too great magnitude and too costly to run any risk of failure for want of experience.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You believe that the foreign companies are much more expert?

Admiral BRADFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And will give us a better cable?

Admiral BRADFORD. Yes. Not that they have any better workmen, but they have the experience. There is a knack about cable making which has been acquired by long experience, and Great Britain has almost a monopoly of this experience.

Mr. COOK. And what is the longest stretch of cable you have ever manufactured?

Mr. HUGHES. Probably less than 200 miles.

Mr. COOK. Have you a cable ship for laying cables?

Mr. SATTERLEE. No, sir. Pardon me; I do not want to be cross-examined by the gentleman if it is to come out of my time.

Mr. COOK. Have you the present manufacturing facilities for manufacturing a cable 8,000 miles long?

Mr. SATTERLEE. We have the manufacturing facilities except we have not the necessary number of machines.

Mr. COOK. What is the longest cable that your company has manufactured?

Mr. SATTERLEE. I do not think it is over 200 or 300 miles.

Mr. MANN. You think the principal object of the Pacific cable is to develop that business?

Mr. SATTERLEE. Yes, sir; because that will put the cable-building industries of this country in such a position that the United States will have that under their control, as they should have.

A great deal has been said by gentlemen about foreigners who own stocks in the Commercial Pacific Cable Company. Of course this is not a legitimate argument, but it is more in the nature of an appeal to prejudice. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], our worthy associate on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, evidently was laboring under a wrong impression about this. I said, in the remarks I submitted on the consideration of the rule in this case, that not more than 10 per cent of the stock of this company was owned by foreigners. I refer to the evidence taken on the hearings before the committee.

Mr. WARD. No. He controls it himself. The English directors, I think, hold only 200 shares—100 shares each. Only about 10 per cent of the stock is owned directly or indirectly on the other side.

Mr. STEWART. Are you an American citizen?

Mr. WARD. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. Is the majority of the stock owned by Mr. Mackay?

Mr. WARD. He controls the majority of the stock.

Mr. MANN. Do you know whether or not he owns the majority of it?

Mr. WARD. He owns a very large amount. He and his friends certainly have the control, and a great majority.

Mr. Chairman, there is one peculiar feature of this controversy which, it seems to me, will explain the activity of certain telegraph and cable interests which two years ago were in favor of a private corporation laying and operating the Pacific cable with a Government subsidy of $300,000 a year and their present advocacy of a cable owned and operated by the United States Government. This peculiar feature of the controversy was brought out at the hearings before the House committee, and it appears that Mr. Baylies, the attorney for the Scrymser interests, and Mr. Clark, the vice-president of the Western Union Telegraph Company, have completely changed front and are now in favor of a Government cable, although they were in favor of a private cable two years ago, and that the reason of this change is that they are consulting the private interests of their respective corporations rather than the interests of the public. The following are quotations from the hearings before the House committee:

The CHAIRMAN. When you have appeared before this committee on other occasions you were not, my recollection is, in favor of a governmental cable?
Mr. BAYLIES. No, sir; we strongly opposed it.
The CHAIRMAN. At that time you came asking substantially for a contract with the Government that would be in the nature of aid to your enterprise?
Mr. BAYLIES. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You now propose, if the Government cable is established, to exercise your right, which you now possess, of the construction of a cable from Manila to China and Japan?
Mr. BAYLIES. If we have the Government's assistance to the extent of breaking up the existing monopoly by building a cable to the Philippines. The money for the rest we propose to supply.
The CHAIRMAN. You are now an advocate of the Government building a link between your other cables that may land in this country and Manila and the cables which you propose to establish between Manila and other points?
Mr. BAYLIES. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. Then you are still here asking for aid from the Government, but simply in a different form?
Mr. BAYLIES. We are asking its moral support, not its financial aid.
The CHAIRMAN. You ask its financial aid in the construction of the link in the cable that you proposed yourself to build two years ago with a subsidy?
Mr. BAYLIES. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. So that your attitude of interest is perhaps as great now as then, but simply changed in form?
Mr. BAYLIES. That is also true. We certainly have been working for a great many years to establish a Pacific cable, and this is the only way of doing it.
The CHAIRMAN. So your advocacy of a Government cable now is substantially the same as it was when you opposed a governmental cable two years ago?

From statement of Mr. Thomas W. Clark, vice-president of the Western Union Telegraph Company.

The CHAIRMAN. If I understand your statement, the Commercial Pacific Cable Company now have arrangements by which they could gather up and could distribute general telegraphic business from Manila throughout China and Japan, and so forth?
Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. They have that arrangement now?
Mr. CLARK. As I understand it; yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Then they have an arrangement through the ownership of the Postal Telegraph Company by which they could gather up and distribute messages here in the United States?
Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You have that also here in the United States?
Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. You do not have that facility from Manila, we will say, or from the Philippine Islands, throughout China and Japan?
Mr. CLARK. Only as the business is apportioned by the Eastern Company now.
The CHAIRMAN. You have no right?
Mr. CLARK. We have no right.
The CHAIRMAN. No right at this time?
Mr. CLARK. No, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Now, the Pacifice Cable Company propose to put in that missing link at their own expense?
Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Connecting San Francisco with the islands; and they, you think, would use their company here, in the United States?
Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. To the exclusion of your own?
Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Now, while they are willing to do all this at their own expense, you object to their doing it unless your own company can be a participant in the advantages of building that cable?
Mr. CLARK. No, sir; I say that a Government cable will serve all a great deal better and give us our share—that is the whole truth of it.
The CHAIRMAN. Then you want some method adopted by which, without any additional expense to you—to your company—you can have these advantages which the other company is willing to pay for?
Mr. CLARK. That is my chief desire; yes, sir.

Mr. Chairman, it is but candor on my part to say that I do not doubt the actual rivaling interests and jealousies of the Western Union Telegraph Company. The testimony just referred to in the hearings before the committee discloses beyond doubt the selfish attitude of the Western Union in this contest. With that rivalry this House has nothing whatever to do. Our business is to get the best arrangement we can for the people out of this conflict between these great rival companies. It is just such competition as that we should welcome. It is competition that will drive the scare crows of octopus monopoly from the legislative pathway of the gentleman from Michigan. I fear that they haunt him in his sleeping hours. It is perfectly patent that the Western Union contemplated the construction of a cable line from Manila to China, provided the Government would build and operate the important link from California to Manila, and thereby, without expense to the Western Union, secure a continuous connection with its trans-Atlantic cable lines.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the source of all the opposition to private ownership. The Western Union said plainly that it would not be willing to risk $12,000,000 in the construction of the Pacific cable line to Manila. The Commercial Pacific Cable Company has declared its willingness to build the cable without one dollar of subsidy from the Government. There it is. I feel confident what the judgment of this House will be on such a proposition.

The gentleman from Michigan has spent much time and labor to convince the House that certain concessions granted by Spain and China before the Spanish-American war to the Eastern Extension Cable Company would be used and appropriated by the Commercial Pacific Cable Company if allowed to build the Pacific cable line, to perpetuate and extend a dreadful existing monopoly enjoyed by the Eastern Company. He says:

Now, what can we do about it? Absolutely nothing, except by the power of the Government of the United States. Under these conditions, fortunately, the right of the Government to lay its own cables was reserved. I will put those provisions in the RECORD, so that you may read them correctly.

So do I say, if the gentleman from Michigan is right, what can our Government do about it? If China has granted an exclusive right to this Eastern Company "to lay and operate cables and telegraph lines in China," how can our Government secure entrance to China with its cable line except with the consent of China and the Eastern Extension Cable Company? The gentleman from Michigan says:

Mr. CORLISS. I was about to reach that question. It has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States in an identically similar case with reference to a land grant in California when we annexed that territory. It has also been held by the Supreme Court of the United States in a ferryboat case under a grant which was held to be perpetual. It has been held in another case that I can refer to that these exclusive grants made by foreign governments before we acquired the territory were binding upon our Government.

According to his own process of reasoning, the conclusion is irresistible that if the Government of the United States should construct and operate the proposed Pacific cable it would be compelled to end at Manila and have no eastern connections for the transmission of messages, unless the Government could make some through-rate arrangement with the Eastern Company—the very company that the Commercial Pacific Cable Company, which is to build this line, has already made an arrangement with to regulate and control "through rates."

What service to our commerce would a cable line be that did not have some arrangement for through rates to other foreign countries? But if the gentleman thought that the Government of the United States and all the world besides were bound by the grant of these foreign concessions, why, I ask him, did he draw the eighth section of his bill, now under consideration, as follows:

SEC. 8. That for the promotion of our commercial and other interests, the Postmaster-General, Secretary of War, and Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized to enter into negotiations and establish cable communication through existing cable lines or cable lines hereafter constructed.

The significant point or feature in that section of the bill is the words "or cable lines hereafter constructed." The purpose was to authorize the President, in order for the securing of "through rates" to foreign countries—that is, Japan and China—to enter into negotiation with existing cable lines "or cable lines hereafter constructed." It is right there on "the cable lines hereafter constructed" that the great Western Union had anchored its hopes and expectations. How, I ask, would the Western Union have secured "through rates" by reason of connections unless the Eastern Extension Cable Company was reckoned with in some way? The fact is that the opinions which I have read from ex-Attorney-General Griggs, affirmed by Attorney-General Knox, states the law fully that these contracts or concessions, made in the way they were, are not binding as contracts on our Government.

In addition to all that has been said in the way of abuse, vituperation, and intemperate speech about the plain and simple business arrangement that the Commercial Pacific Cable Company has made with the Eastern Extension Cable Company for the transmission of through messages, yet the fact stands out in bold relief that the Commercial Pacific Cable Company has no monopoly or exclusive rights that would prevent or interfere with the establishment of another cable company. That proposition can not be denied.

I have, Mr. Chairman, to the best of my ability, presented the facts bearing upon this important subject as I understand them. I am utterly unwilling to see our Government enter as a competitor with our citizens in the domain of private enterprise. This is a far-reaching and dangerous question. It behooves the Congress to cast behind local considerations and meet this question, as it relates to the cardinal principles of our form of government. No man can predict to what extent this policy of Government ownership will go if once inaugurated. The evils that we now complain of in the multiplying of Federal officeholders will be but a small, gently flowing rivulet to the mighty hungry and thirsty hosts and throngs of officeholders that will gather in the sweeping tide of Government ownership.

Such a policy makes a murmuring, complaining, dissatisfied, and discontented citizenship. It drives peace, prosperity, and contentment from the homes of the masses of the people. It creates that which ought to be condemned by every true-born American citizen—a favored class, a class that would fawn and humbly crawl at the foot of public officers. Yes, Government ownership emancipates independence and manhood from the lives of our people and teaches subservience. Away with it! The Government should have or own nothing but what it gets from the people.

It has no right to snatch from its citizens the opportunity to make a living in legitimate and honest private enterprise. I hope that the result of the action of the House on this bill will be so decisive against it that such legislation will never be asked again.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the other side desire to occupy some of their time now?

Mr. MANN. In the absence of the gentleman from Michigan, and representing the gentleman, I will ask how much time is there remaining on both sides?

The CHAIRMAN. Forty-six minutes remaining to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MANN. And how much to the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. An hour and ten minutes have been used by the gentleman on the other side.

Mr. MANN. In behalf of the gentleman from Michigan, I yield twenty-three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, Congress has seldom been called on to determine questions of more importance than the underlying principle of this bill.

That government is best which is least paternal and gives widest scope to individual activity and responsibility. The day that this Republic shall thrust out its paternal hand to relieve the citizen from absolute responsibility for his own success or failure will mark the beginning of the decadence of our race. The greatness of the American people in all fields of human action is but the outgrowth of a system which for multitudinous generations has largely left every man to be the architect of his own fortune—to stand or fall according to the measure of his own efforts and merit.

This Government should not engage in any enterprise which is not authorized by its organic law and which is not also the exercise of governmental functions. No government should go into business for mere profit in competition with its citizens.

Then the first question to be determined is whether or not our organic law authorizes the United States to construct and operate an ocean cable. I contend that it does. The Federal Constitution provides:

> Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.

In passing upon this provision the Supreme Court of the United States has said:

> The power of Congress to construct, or to authorize individuals or corporations to construct, national highways and bridges from State to State is essential to the complete control and regulation of interstate commerce. Without authority in Congress to establish and maintain such highways and bridges it would be without authority to regulate one of the most important adjuncts of commerce.

Chief Justice Waite, speaking for the court on another occasion, says:

> The electric telegraph marks an epoch in the progress of time. In a little more than a quarter of a century it has changed the habits of business and become one of the necessities of commerce. It is indispensable as a means of intercommunication, but especially is it so in commercial transactions. The statistics of the business before the recent reduction in rates show that more than 80 per cent of all messages sent by the telegraph related to commerce. Goods are sold and money paid by telegraphic orders, contracts are made by telegraphic correspondence, and cargoes secured and the movement of ships directed. The telegraphic announcement of markets abroad regulates prices at home, and a prudent merchant rarely enters upon an important transaction without using the telegraph freely. A telegraph company occupies the same relation to commerce as a carrier of messages that a railroad does as a carrier of goods. Both are instruments of commerce, and their business is commerce itself. They do their transporting in different ways, and their liabilities are in some respects different, but they are both indispensable to those engaged to any considerable extent in commercial pursuits.

These decisions and the provision of the Constitution quoted clearly establish the constitutional right of this Government to construct and operate the cable provided for in this bill.

But it is not enough that the Constitution authorizes the proposed legislation. It should further appear that the construction and operation of this cable by the United States would be the exercise of governmental functions. Francis A. Walker has laid down what seems to me a correct rule for determining what are and what are not governmental functions. He says:

> The line between governmental functions and those which are not is the line between services and offices which tend to become monopolies and those which do not.

Ocean cables not only tend to become, but are already monopolies of the worst character.

Some gentlemen have inveighed against a Government cable because it is what they choose to call Populism. One gentleman declared that arguments in favor of this bill sounded more like speeches in a Populist convention than deliberations in Congress, and he read from a Populist platform to justify what he had said. Because this principle found a place in a Populist platform is no reason why we should oppose it if it is sound. There are many things in Populist platforms which if put into form of law would relieve the people from oppression by the trusts. There are worse people than the Populists, for, be it said to their everlasting credit, they have always raised their voices and cast their votes in favor of relieving the people from monopolies.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit a question?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Did the gentleman ever see the doctrine of public ownership in a Republican or a Democratic platform?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. On that subject I will read to the gentleman from one whose Democracy and statesmanship he will not question. In 1850 Mr. Benton, of Missouri, introduced a bill providing for Government construction and ownership of a great railroad and public highway from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean. I will read his own words in behalf of the proposition. He said:

> It is to be national in its form and use, consisting not of a single road adapted to a single kind of transportation, but a system of roads adapted to all kinds of traveling, and all kinds of carrying, free from monopoly and private interests and free from tolls. The construction and jurisdiction of the highway are to both be in the hands of the General Government; and these are the hands in which every public and national consideration would require them to be.
> I have demonstrated the nationality of this work, its practicability, and the means in our hands for making it. I do not expatiate upon its importance. When finished it will be the American road to Asia and will turn the Asiatic commerce of Europe through the heart of our America. It will make us the mistress of that trade, rich at home and powerful abroad, and reviving a line of oriental and almost fabulous cities to stretch across our continent—Tyres, Sidons, Palmyras, Balbecs. Do we need any stimulus for the undertaking? Any other nation, upon half a pretext, would go to war for the right of making it and would tax unborn generations for its completion. We have it without war, without tax, without treaty with any power, and when we make it all nations must travel it with our permission and behave themselves to receive permission. Besides riches and power, it will give us a hold upon the good behavior of nations by the possession which it will give us of the short, safe, and cheap route to India.

These, sir, are the words of one of the greatest and soundest Democrats who ever raised his voice in the councils of our great party.

The first telegraph line ever constructed in this country was under an act of Congress providing for Government ownership and operation. When it passed the Senate there was not enough opposition to it to call for an aye-and-no vote. In the Senate at that time were Thomas H. Benton, Rufus King, James Buchanan, John C. Calhoun. All of them either supported the measure or let it pass without opposition. Were these Populists?

Testimony before our committee shows that 25 cents per word would yield a liberal profit upon the amount of money involved in a Pacific cable; yet private corporations have maintained the rate at $2.28 per word. This is an unreasonable and unjust burden upon commerce. It is the duty of Congress to remove this monopoly from our trade. In no other way can such adequate relief be given as by the Government construction and ownership of a cable as provided for in this bill.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] says that it has been demonstrated that if we had the cable there would be three foreigners use it for every American, and that we ought not to be building cables for foreigners. I believe this is a mistake. I believe as many Americans as foreigners would use it, but even if it be as he says, it would still be no argument against the enterprise. We should want foreigners to use it and the more the better. We should want them to come to the other end of the cable and call us up to negotiate trades for our corn and wheat, our hogs and cattle, our cotton and wool, our minerals and manufactured goods. If the foreigner should use our cable more than we it would be because he needs more of our goods than we do of his. We want to sell him all he needs, and if a cable will promote this end let us build it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask if the gentleman from Michigan desires me to use further time now or if he desires to consume some of his time?

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I desire that the gentleman shall conclude the time allotted to his side of the question.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia that the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] granted me five minutes of his time, so that my time will be fifteen minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Very well.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to speak upon this bill. I supposed that the very limited time afforded for debate would be entirely consumed by the members of the committee, but the absence of two of the most distinguished opponents of this bill opens an opportunity, and the attacks which have been made upon Mr. Mackay prompts me to avail myself of that opportunity. I am the friend of Mr. Mackay and am proud of his friendship. For many years he was a resident and citizen of the State of Nevada. He there laid the foundation for his great fortune, and during that time won such a reputation for character, ability, integrity, geniality, and forcefulness that today there is no more popular man in that State than John W. Mackay.

The people of that State have followed him with friendship and admiration in his career since, which, starting in that small State, has now extended itself over the entire world in enterprises of a world-wide character. One of the gentlemen, in an expression which he afterwards withdrew, referred to Mr. Mackay as an expatriated American. Another spoke of him as a man who desired to steal something, who desired to steal some advantage in Cuba, who desired to steal a franchise in the Pacific.

Now, I wish to say with reference to Mr. Mackay that no one who knows him would ever question his integrity, his straightforwardness, or his candor, and as to his expatriation, while a portion of his family have lived abroad, everyone who knows him realizes the fact that no more robust American lives; that he resides continuously in this country, only occasionally and for brief periods making trips abroad; that all his enterprises are American and all of them intended to advance American prestige throughout the world.

This miner, starting in Nevada, in an humble way, without means, realizing there by energy, courage, character, and ability, a large fortune, was not content to retire at ease; he sought the world for his arena and soon grappled with one of the greatest organizations in the world—the Atlantic cable combination, composed of two or three companies, whose charges were 50 cents a word. At first he put his rates 15 or 20 cents per word below that of this combination. They sought to drive him out of business by reducing the rate to 12½ cents a word, one-fourth of their previous rate.

He fixed his rate at 25 cents a word and sought to meet the competition there for some time and finally was compelled to reduce it to 12½ cents a word, and then that formidable combination was compelled, after a two years' struggle, to abandon the contest, and the result was that the rate was fixed not at the old rate of 50 cents a word, not at the rate which Mr. Mackay had originally fixed of 35 cents a word, but at the rate he fixed after the combination sought to drive him out, namely, 25 cents a word, and there it remains to-day.

He then started the Postal Telegraph Company enterprise and met Jay Gould in the field of competition, and there he fixed his own rates and maintained them, compelling the Western Union at all competitive points to reduce its rates, and to-day the rates fixed by Mackay and the rates fixed by the Western Union as the result of the competition remain. In no event did he seek by combination with his opponents, as is so often the case, to recoup from the public the losses which he had temporarily sustained. He is not one of those men who have made fortunes by combining enterprises previously hostile and then seeking to fleece the public at large and to draw from them great profits which will counterbalance the losses made during the period of competition.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. Is the gentleman aware that a man named Ward represents Mr. Mackay and testified before our committee, and that he admitted that there was an agreement between his company and the other cable companies across the Atlantic whereby the rate of the cable had been raised from 12½ cents to 25 cents per word?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I stated that the rate was finally fixed at 25 cents a word, but that was the rate made by Mr. Mackay, to which the other cable companies were compelled to conform. Mackay's company forced cable rates from 50 to 25 cents a word, just one-half. The old rates have never been restored. No consolidation of lines was effected, as is so often done in order to restore the old rates. Now, I must decline to yield further.

Mr. CORLISS. Well, one moment——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I must decline to yield to the gentleman. I have only a short time, and I can not be diverted from my argument by questions.

Mr. Mackay also built the Haiti cable, and the Government of the United States took possession of it during the late Spanish war. General Greely, authorized by Mr. McKinley to make a contract with that company of $75,000 for the exclusive use of the cable for a month, effected it for $60,000, and had the exclusive control of the offices and the cable during the Santiago campaign, just as the Government of the United States will in the future have the control of the cable that Mr. Mackay now proposes to build to the Philippines whenever the United States sees fit to claim it. Then Mackay sought admission for his lines to Cuba. The gentleman from Michigan characterizes this as an attempt to steal Cuba. It is true that the War Department held that the Western Union had an exclusive franchise in Cuba, but I leave it to the sense of fairness of the House as to whether an endeavor to break an existing monopoly and to give the Cuban people the benefit of reduced rates can be justly called a steal and whether the man who proposes such a public benefit is to be held up as a malefactor. At all events, as the result of Mr. Mackay's attempt rates in Cuba have been reduced one-half, just as his threatened cable to the Philippines has caused a reduction in the rates of cable to the Philippines via Europe of nearly one-half.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have before us four parties in interest in this controversy. First, we have the American Cable Company, that wants the contract let to American cable manufacturers. Then we have the Western Union Company, which, having formerly been the advocate of a subsidy, of which it expected to be the beneficiary, now refuses to lay a cable itself and seeks to have the Government build it, so that it can cooperate with it at both ends—in America through its present lines and in Asia through lines which it hopes to build. And then we have those who believe in Government ownership. And last we have this existing corporation, the Commercial Pacific Cable Company, an American company, composed of American capitalists, headed by Mr. Mackay, which has already let the contract for its cable, having paid $185,000 upon account, of which cable, I am informed, 1,000 miles have already been made.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. They have actually paid $500,000 on the contract from the coast of California to Honolulu.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Five hundred thousand dollars. I accept the correction of the gentleman. A company which proposes to make the rate to Manila and China $1 per word where now it is $1.66, and to make the Government rate 50 cents per word, and to surrender control of the cable in case of war, and turn over the cable to the Government if it wants it, at its value, to be appraised by arbitrators.

Now, I wish to say that so far as the American cable manufacturers are concerned I should be glad of any arrangement that would enable this cable to be built upon American soil, but I do not believe in the delay that would follow, for you all know that these cable factories do not exist in this country to-day; that is to say, they have limited plants. It would take a long period of time before they could inaugurate the plants necessary to do this work, and besides that it is admitted that the cost would be at least 10 per cent greater than if the cable is bought in the markets of the world.

As to Government ownership, it is admitted by all that this cable from San Francisco to Manila will cost from twelve to fifteen million dollars. We will put it at the lowest figure, $12,000,000. It is evident, therefore, that the Government will have to expend $12,000,000 at the outset for a single cable. But any man of experience in the cable business knows that a single cable will not do, that a second cable must be laid in order to guard against accident; so that we have in the near future an ultimate expenditure by the Government of the United States of from twenty-five to thirty million dollars.

Now, for what will that expenditure be made? Why, that will be for a cable that connects this country with the Hawaiian Islands, with a population of 125,000 people, and with Manila, with a population of 300,000 people, the commercial city of the Philippine Islands. And it is admitted that the receipts from the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands can not pay the operating expenses of the cable. It is admitted that you must rely upon the commercial business, not simply of the Philippine Islands, but the commercial business beyond—in China, India, and Japan—and that there you must enter into competition with the great cable lines that run from Europe to India and China. So you have a limited income from these sources that are under governmental control, and the Government must enter into a connection with some line at Manila for the purpose of transferring its messages beyond to China, Japan, and India.

Now, upon what company must it rely? Why, upon the company that is intrenched there now—the Eastern Extension Cable Company, which has been referred to—which has a cable from Hongkong to Manila under a franchise granted by the Spanish Government, which the gentleman from Michigan says constitutes an exclusive monopoly. They have that franchise now and they have the line there. It would be a duplication of capital to build another.

If the Government of the United States is not to utilize the very telegraph and cable lines that Mr. Mackay's company proposes to utilize, then the United States will have to build a line of its own from the Philippine Islands to China, Japan, and India, and I ask how the Government of the United States can expect a concession to be made by any other government that would give it the absolute control of both ends of the line. That might be given to a cable company which represents the entire commercial world, but certainly it will never be granted by any self-respecting government to another government, for under it the latter would have exclusive control of the medium of communication—a control which may involve great advantage, both in commerce and in war.

So that if the Government builds this line, unless it is content with local receipts from the Philippine Islands and Hawaii, which will not pay the operating expenses, much less the interest upon the capital invested, it must either build its line with the consent of other governments to China, India, and Japan, or it must use this Eastern Extension Company's line, and then I have no doubt the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] would declaim against having the Government of the United States in partnership with that great eastern extension monopoly, upon which he heaps his denunciation, as the partner in iniquity of Mr. Mackay. A simple business arrangement between the Mackay cable extending from America to Manila, with a cable system extending from Manila to China, Japan, and India and intended to secure quick and cheap communication in the interest of commerce between America and the centers of business in the Orient, is thus held up to reprobation.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the arrangement with the Eastern Extension Company is simply a business arrangement for the purpose of promoting the commerce of the United States and for the purpose of promoting needed communication, and if the Government builds the cable to the Philippines it will have to make the same arrangements unless it buys out the Eastern Extension Company and itself operates the lines to China, Japan, and India.

Now, what is the Pacific Commercial Company? The company organized at first with a capital of only $300,000, because of taxes imposed upon capital in New York, but afterwards enlarged to $3,000,000. They have provided the necessary capital, and now $3,000,000 is behind the enterprise, and a contract has been let for a cable from San Francisco to the Hawaiian Islands, over 2,000 miles, upon which $500,000 has been paid.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. They have recently furnished a certificate of capital stock of $12,000,000 for this purpose.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And the gentleman from Alabama informs me that they have filed a certificate of increase of capital stock to $12,000,000. Another guarantee of the good faith of this company and of its intention to prosecute this great work vigorously. The very name of John Mackay was a sufficient guarantee of the legitimacy and good faith of the enterprise, and to those who know him no other guarantee is required.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield such part of the twenty-five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] as he desires,

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment.

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] desires to give notice of an amendment, and I will yield him two minutes before the gentleman from California proceeds.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that at the proper time I propose to offer as a substitute for the pending bill that which I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide for the laying of submarine cables.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever satisfied by surveys of the Navy Department or otherwise of the practicability of a cable or cables connecting any portion of the United States with any other portion thereof, with its possessions or territories or any of them or with any foreign countries, the President is hereby authorized to grant a license to any responsible person or corporation for the construction and laying of such submarine cable or cables upon such terms and conditions and guaranties as he shall deem to be proper, and the President, when satisfied with the terms, conditions, and guaranties offered, is hereby authorized to permit such cable to be laid: Provided, That said license, amongst other things, shall contain a condition that the United States, its officers, agents, and its insular or territorial governments upon the route of any such cable, shall have priority for their cablegrams over all other business, at such rates as the Postmaster-General shall annually fix; and a condition that the United States may purchase the cable lines, property, and effects of the person or corporation licensed as aforesaid, at an appraised value to be ascertained by disinterested persons, two to be selected by the Postmaster-General, two by the person or corporation interested, and a fifth by the four so selected; such value shall not be enhanced by the earnings, good will, or franchises of said person or corporation; and a further condition that the cable or cables to be laid between the United States and its outlying possessions and countries shall be of American manufacture and laid by ships under American registry: And provided further, That such American cables shall be first-class in material, construction, equipment, and operation, and can be procured without unreasonable delay.

SEC. 2. That no person or corporation, except such as shall be authorized under the provisions of this act, shall be permitted to lay any submarine cable or cables connecting the United States with its possessions or territories or with any other country.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday I listened to the reading of a rule submitted to us on this side of the House by those whom we denominate our leaders, setting aside four hours of debate for the consideration of a great fundamental proposition, a new departure on the part of this Government. A few days before we heard a rule coming from that committee giving unlimited time to the discussion of a bill known as the anarchy bill. During my few years in Congress I have learned this one thing—that whenever there is a well-defined, substantially unanimous sentiment in behalf of any measure, then the Committee on Rules permit the House to debate that question to their hearts' content; but when a new great question like this comes up four hours is all you can have.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. The time limit in the rule reported by the Committee on Rules was the time limit in the resolution which went to the Committee on Rules from the House.

Mr. LOUD. I do not care anything about that.

Mr. DALZELL. Up until the commencement of this debate we have not had anyone before the committee either on this side or the other who has asked for another additional minute than four hours.

Mr. LOUD. I am willing to admit all that. I do not care how much time was asked. What I have said is a statement of fact, and the condition of the presentation to the Committee on Rules can not change a fact.

Now, here within thirty-five minutes of the closing of the debate, the gentleman from Pennsylvania submits to us another proposition which reminds me of the power of the Infinite. The power of the Infinite because it comes from a source we know not of. It is a secret, and hence its power. So with our Committee on Rules, its actions are as dark and secret as the acts ever committed in the dark of the night. They are our leaders, and most of us follow them.

I believe that this is one of the greatest questions that confront this country, because, as I said before, it is a departure from the well-founded fundamental principles that the Government shall not embark in any enterprises which private capital and individuals have heretofore monopolized the field of and are willing to embark in.

I have listened all winter to my dyspeptic friend from Michigan. [Laughter.] I sometimes believe that Desdemona had much to be thankful for; that she never knew that the twentieth century would produce such a lean and hungry Cassius as we have in the gentleman from Michigan [laughter], who has pleaded with us all winter, in season and out of season, for the Government to construct a cable from here to Manila.

Oh, he tells us, as every gentleman does who advocates this bill, that he is against the Government ownership and operation of railroads; that he is against the Government operation and ownership of cables; but in this instance, except in this one instance—now don't laugh, because you remind me of something that occurred some time ago in reference to the man who is the original economist, and who said that if you want to be economical you must be economical in your own district; but if a man has fundamental principles about Government ownership and utilities he has got to be virtuous all the time. It won't do to go around nights, for he may get into temptation.

If it is wrong for the Government to build and operate railroads—and my friend from Pennsylvania quite agrees with me on that subject—if it is wrong to build and operate cables, the same rule must apply in one instance as in the other, because the principle is fundamental.

I have heard this ever since I have been in Congress. I have heard gentlemen stand up here and cry against this extravagance and that extravagance in somebody else's district, but when it comes to the matter in which they are interested, the principle goes to the wind. There has been thrown into this argument something wholly immaterial, not bearing upon this question. Even the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] a gentleman for whom I have as much respect and regard for his uprightness and his honesty and integrity as any gentleman I ever met, had to throw into the arena his poisoned shaft yesterday, that John W. Mackay was an expatriated American. Did the gentleman, and I give him credit for it—did the gentleman from Pennsylvania know the reasons that had put that idea into his head he would have cleaved his tongue out by the roots before he ever would have uttered that sentence.

Mr. Mackay's personality cuts no figure in this question. I do not have the honor of the gentleman's acquaintance, though he has been, however, a resident of my State a great many years. He has accumulated a large fortune by honest toil, and during those days of mining excitement in my State, when the mass of the mining men there were accused of fleecing the masses of the people by forcing stocks up and down, during all that period, where millions and millions were lost and won in a day, was there ever a breath of scandal against John W. Mackay?

He is a legitimate business man; he is engaged in a legitimate business. I understand we have assurance that he proposes to build a cable to Manila. Now, why not let him build it? Why not let John Smith or Tom Jones or anybody else build a cable to Manila if they want to?

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LOUD. Yes; if it is only a question.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman tell us what the residence of Mr. Mackay now is?

Mr. LOUD. I can not. I suppose the gentleman is a resident of the city of New York, but he may be a resident of San Francisco. I do not know how that is.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated that he had been a resident of California so many years, and I wish to say that the certificate of the Commercial Cable Company states that he is still a resident of Virginia City, Nev.

Mr. LOUD. Well, that is immaterial.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me material, as a number of gentlemen have been quarreling about where he resides.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Allow me to say that Mr. Mackay spends a part of the time in New York, a part of the time in San Francisco, and a part of his time in Nevada.

Mr. LOUD. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] very frankly says that he is against this bill, and he throws in here at the close of this debate a measure that he proposes to support which compels the laying of a line, if it shall be laid, of cable manufactured in American workshops. Yes; that sounds well. I have seen the American flag wrapped around a great many gentlemen in days gone by, and even to-day, in defense of that principle of the protection of American labor and American interest, and I am in favor of it, too, to a reasonable point. Gentlemen from Pennsylvania—not "the gentleman from Pennsylvania," but gentlemen from Pennsylvania—in days gone by have taught us the beautiful principle of protection. It has been the prevailing sentiment of the American nation. But I venture one assertion—that the great State of Pennsylvania has gotten the loaves and fishes and we poor people on the outskirts of civilization have gotten the crumbs that you throw to the birds. Now, let me offer one suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania: There is such a thing as riding protection to death. And let me give you a warning here to-day, before the entire structure comes down on your head, burying you with the rest of civilization: Do not carry protection too far.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LOUD. Yes, sir.

Mr. DALZELL. I want to say to him that there is not a State that under the Dingley bill receives anything like the protection that the State of California receives——

Mr. LOUD. That may be.

Mr. DALZELL. And that has been given at the instance, among others, of the gentleman who is now lecturing "the gentleman from Pennsylvania."

Mr. LOUD. I merely make this statement: The gentleman can take his own time (being a member of the Committee on Rules, he can get all the time he wants) to controvert that question. It is a debatable question, and if scientifically debated would take more than four hours. I know the gentleman himself would want three to sustain the position he takes. [Laughter.] I see that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] said yesterday—and I quote from page 6582 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—

> John W. Mackay was then in the position that I am now.

That was referring to the time that Mr. Mackay was attempting to get the landing of the cable in Cuba; and before that, or later on, the gentleman cited some authority of the Attorney-General to show that we could not grant such concession. I happened to be a member of the Insular Affairs Committee before which that question came up, and I do not think that there is a gentleman present on either side but who will agree with me that the reason the committee did not consider that proposition was because of the solemn pledge we had given to Cuba that ultimately she should have her independence, and that we would protect her as far as we could, and that we would not attempt to determine questions of that kind. That is what the Attorney-General meant in the opinion he rendered—that the United States Government, after our pledge, had no authority or did not see fit to exercise any power to grant a concession to this cable company to land in Cuba. A little later on my friend said: "John W. Mackay was then in the position that I am now." My friend said "Mr. Mackay thought our Government would let him steal a great public utility." Now, what did the gentleman mean by that? He had said, "John W. Mackay was then in the position that I am now," and then he says, "Mr. Mackay thought our Government would let him steal a great public utility."

Mr. CORLISS rose.

Mr. LOUD. No; I will not yield to the gentleman, because he refused to yield yesterday. The gentleman can get in on his own time. I throw out the suggestion, and he can answer it as he sees fit. I do not know what impelled the gentleman to make the statement, or what he was attempting to suggest. I noticed in the paper——

Mr. CORLISS rose.

Mr. LOUD. I refuse to yield.

Mr. CORLISS. I am not asking the gentleman to yield.

Mr. LOUD. Well, you are up. I hope the Chair will make the gentleman sit down and listen to what I am saying.

Now, the gentleman has a great habit of appealing to the Infinite.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] will take his seat. The gentleman from California declines to yield. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. I saw in the Washington Post, which of course is not absolutely authentic, because I have looked over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the gentleman's speech and I can not find the language which the Post uses, but I will have to give the Washington Post credit for this reference to the Almighty——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The Post language is the best.

Mr. LOUD. I think so. I do not know whether the gentleman edited it out of his speech or whether he uttered the words or not, but he is reported as follows:

> "God Almighty," said Mr. CORLISS, in conclusion, "seems to be working in a mysterious way to save the people of the United States from the clutch of this monopoly."

Well, I find a part of that language in the RECORD, but in listening to the gentleman this morning—and I do not know what the RECORD will say—I heard the gentleman say [laughter], "God Almighty, in His infinite way, is working in this mysterious way, and He has cut this cable over there between Manila and Hongkong."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. A sort of divine interposition.

Mr. LOUD. Yes; a divine interposition, in order to bring the people of this country to their senses and to show them that now is the last hour in which they can save themselves from eternal damnation by adopting the Corliss Government cable bill. [Laughter.] Well, now, I do not know much about cables. I do not know much more than the gentleman from Michigan [laughter], who has studied this question ever since he has been a member of Congress with an industry, permit me to say, worthy of a better cause; but I did have occasion in 1899 to go to Europe for the express purpose of investigating the question of postal telegraphs. Now, it is surprising how little the average person knows as he goes along from day to day and has nothing to disturb him. When I first went to London and talked with the postal people there about their postal telegraph system, how it was working, and so forth, I was told, "Oh, excellently." "Making money?" "Yes; making money all the time."

I said, "Let us get at your reports, let us see how much you are making." And if any one of you have followed the debates in the English Parliament for the last two years, you will have seen what a fuss England is now making about the condition that has been existent in their own community and with which they were unfamiliar. I was told that the English postal system was profitable. Well, now, unfortunately, England keeps an accurate account of its different systems, and unfortunately it prints them, too, and they are accessible to everybody. They were accessible at that time to any citizen of England or the world, and their own Parliamentary reports say that ending with the fiscal year in March, 1898, since 1872 England had lost £7,235,897 5s. 4d., which, reduced to American money, would be in the vicinity of $35,000,000. Beginning with a profit when they bought this telegraph system, taking it from a private enterprise, a well-organized system, the first year I think—I am not exact in figures—a profit of £40,000 was returned and the next year a profit of £20,000, and never from that time to this has England made it pay. Let any person examine this report, and it is here in the postal-service investigation——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. LOUD. Yes; just for a suggestion.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would ask the gentleman if there was in that system a reduction of rates?

Mr. LOUD. Well, yes; I will come to that if you want it. The deficit has increased from £984 7s. 3d., when the reduction was made, and the next year after the reduction was made it was £112,524, some shillings and pence, until in the fiscal year 1898 it had steadily crawled up and was £600,006 12d., continuing to increase since that time.

Mr. WACHTER. What was the proportion of reduction?

Mr. LOUD. The reduction was from a shilling to 6 pence, and England has what they call a cheap postal telegraph system.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. One other mere question.

Mr. LOUD. I have only a minute or two. I will explain that part of it. They pay in England 6 pence for 20 words, but it includes, as you all know, the address and the signature, and the average city address in England—more than in this country—will average from 12 to 14 words, so that it costs you in that small, compact country 6 pence for 6 words. Why, I will venture to assert that if the Western Union Telegraph Company or the Commercial Cable Company, or anybody else, could have the monopoly of the telegraph business in New England and the old Middle States they could send telegrams and earn 10 per cent on their investment at 10 cents a message. Yet England, in that small, compact country, is losing now, I am credibly informed, £800,000 a year—nearly $4,000,000 a year—in the operation of a system which is continually deteriorating.

Now, then, with this example before us, with the example of the great nation of England before us in the operation of the telegraph system, I think this House should pause long and well before it embarks upon any enterprise of this kind, especially if anybody else wants to build it.

Now, I have no very serious objections to the gentleman from Pennsylvania's proposition here when he puts on 20 per cent; he wants to give the American manufacturer the advantage of 20 per cent; but let me say this to the gentleman: I believe that this cable company has entered into arrangements to build this cable to Manila, and if the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] shall pass, it must necessarily hold in the air until one year from now the building of the cable from Hawaii to Manila.

While of course we understand that the great conservative body at the other end of this Capitol will not pass this bill this year, yet it will be held in the air over the heads of gentlemen who have invested their good dollars in this enterprise; and I believe that if this measure be adopted, it will ultimately lead to the defeat of the construction of any private cable to Manila, which I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] does not want to accomplish. If no private individual will build a cable to Manila, then this Government will have to build one. Now, the gentleman does not want that.

All I ask of this House is, quoting from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] yesterday, not to take this one bill, but to take all these bills, and cut them off right close behind the ears, and leave the Pacific Ocean open to him who wants to invest his money in the laying of a cable to connect this country with the countries of the East. [Applause.]

I yield back such time as I have, if I have any remaining.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PERKINS). The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield that time, or such portion of it as he may desire, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRELL].

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, the whole force and energy of the American people has lent itself since the Declaration of Independence to the advancement and prosperity of the individual. It has been contrary to the announced policy of the Government and the desire of those framing legislation that any legislation should be passed or anything done to encourage paternalism or centralization in the Federal Government in any way, shape, or form.

The machinery of the Government has been kept as far as possible reduced to the actual needs of carrying on its different branches. One striking instance of this we have in the size and character of the Army of the United States, which until the breaking out of the war amounted to scarcely 25,000 men, and so on right straight along it has been the policy not to interfere with, but to develop, the individual. Had it not been so, and had our Government, as is the case in many of the governments of Europe, absorbed this, that, and the other branch of the industries, such as they have in France, the tobacco monopoly, and in Germany the management and control of the railroads, our industries would not have reached the gigantic proportions which they have, and we would not have produced the great captains of industry who to-day, together with their methods, are the surprise and amazement of the civilized world.

The grand initial policy of the Republican party throughout has been the doctrine of protection; to foster and build up American industries, and it has been the understood principle in both parties in all branches of our Government, Federal, State, and municipal, not to interfere with private enterprise. First, so that the private individual shall have all the encouragement possible, and second, because with the great resources at the back of the Government it was not fair to put a private individual in competition.

Therefore it is that we have all Government work, as far as possible, let out in the shape of contracts; and even the other day we heard here in the House strong argument against the construction of battle ships in Government navy-yards, and I have heard that within the last few days a provision which was inserted in this body for a certain number to be constructed in Government yards has been stricken out in the Senate.

Take the case of the State prisons. In a number of the States there are laws which forbid the manufacture in State prisons of all articles that can compete with the manufactories supported by private individuals. In other States articles manufactured in the prisons, such as shoes, for instance, have to be distinctly stamped, so that the purchaser shall know that he is purchasing an article which comes in competition with a private enterprise.

The Government has always realized that what is manufactured by it or carried on by it necessarily costs more than what is manufactured by a private individual, for it is impossible for the Government to drive its employees in the way in which an individual can. The hours of labor are shorter, the supervision not so strict, and the character of the work often not so efficient, owing to so many departments of the Government being under civil-service rules.

The report of the British commission which had in charge the investigation of the subject of private cables versus Government cables advises strongly against the construction of cables by the Government, except in such cases where the magnitude of the enterprise would practically deter private individuals, unassisted, undertaking the work. While the Government of France has some five thousand and odd miles of cable, at the same time the longest Government-owned cable is only 544 miles, as against the longest private cable which at present exists, which is 3,250 miles.

We have in this bill a proposition for the Government to engage in a branch of work of which they have practically no knowledge and no experience, and here comes in the element of time, which I consider is a great factor. We have a company composed of reputable business men. The company is prepared to enter into a contract with the Government and to accept all the conditions and terms imposed upon it, and prepared to complete the cable within a definite space of time at the cost of not a dollar to the Government, and from the experience which the people of this country have had with this company they must appreciate the fact that they are making this proposition in good faith, for the reason that it was largely owing to the competition which this company developed that the cable rates to Europe are as low as they are at the present time.

One of the reasons advanced by the British Government against the State controlling cables is the complications which might arise upon the landing of a cable upon territory not controlled by the Government. If the present cable was built by the Government it would have to stop at the Philippines, and owing to such complications as I have referred to, could not be extended to China and Japan, which really to the merchants and business people of this country is the strongest possible reason for the construction of the Pacific cable, opening up as it will countless markets for every sort of article manufactured by the different industries of this country.

The question of cost, if the cable is to be constructed by the Government, is a very serious one. It has been estimated, as has been stated, that the cost will not be less than $15,000,000; that the annual fixed charges will not be less than a million and a half of dollars; and, judging from the amount of business which has been done previously between this country and the Philippines, the income would not exceed $600,000, making it a loss to the Government of almost a million annually, and this apart from the expense resulting from accidents and the maintenance of a large force of high-salaried employees, which, of course, sooner or later, would demand to be put in the classified service.

The argument that the Government would be hampered in relation to its military operations and the conduct of its military affairs in case of war, should the cable be constructed by the Pacific Cable Company, falls to the ground, in view of the conditions of the contract proposed by the Pacific Cable Company, which provides that the Government can at any time take possession of the cable at an appraised valuation, or, if it does not purchase the cable outright, can impose a censorship, in case it so desires, and place in charge its own operators.

It is argued against the Pacific Cable Company that it has entered into a tentative agreement with the Eastern Extension Cable Company, which now holds exclusive privileges in the Philippines, Hawaii, China, and Japan. But would it not be rather bad business if, before agreeing with the United States Government to build a cable, they had not made such arrangements as would give them access to the different parts of the country which they propose to reach?

I wish to call attention to the fact that Admiral Bradford, of the Navy Department, has come out very strongly in opposition to the Government building any of these cables. On page 107 of the hearings he was asked by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS]:

Have you had any experience as to American manufacturers of cables?

His reply was:

No. I may say that I have not been a specialist in making and laying. I have a cable under my Bureau between Key West and the Dry Tortugas, about 60 miles long, and I have made something of a study for twenty-five years of submarine cables for military purposes, but I do not call myself a specialist on such matters.

Mr. CORLISS. Would you not be willing to take the guaranty of a responsible American manufacturer who claimed to have the skill and experience and ability necessary to lay a cable, and with sufficient bond to lay the cable, and with a satisfactory guaranty, say for three years?

Admiral BRADFORD. Not when I know that there is no company in the United States with experience in making and laying deep-sea cables.

Then he was asked in regard to plants, as to whether any existed in this country that were capable of making deep-sea cables. He goes on to say:

I know of no such plants nor of any company with the necessary experience to do the work under consideration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have here a company composed of reputable business men, which company is prepared to enter into a contract to build an American cable, which will tend to build up American industries.

In my judgment, this bill should be opposed by both sides of this Chamber—by the Republican side for the reason that it has been the policy of the Republican party since its foundation to encourage and build up a home industry, whether by preventing foreign competition or governmental competition. It should be opposed by the Democratic side of the House and by every conservative Republican on the score of needless extravagance. In view of this fact it is unfair, it is un-American to allow such an enterprise to be interfered with.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, is my time exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] has twenty-three minutes remaining.

Mr. CORLISS. I yield that time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill proposes that the Government of the United States shall construct, or have constructed or laid, a cable across the Pacific Ocean, to be paid for out of the National Treasury. A majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have reported in favor of the passage of the bill. A very respectable minority of the committee have filed dissenting views, and have urged that the bill be not passed, for the special reason, as set forth, that a private corporation, the Commercial Pacific Cable Company, has now under contract the laying of a cable from San Francisco to Honolulu; and has announced its intention of building the cable connection across the Pacific from Honolulu to Manila and to China. The real question now before the House is whether the Government shall own and operate the cable as an aid to commerce and as a part of the military and naval power or whether the Government shall leave the matter purely to the private capitalists. It may be proper to refer to some of the history of proposed cable legislation in this House.

In the Fifty-fourth Congress a cable bill was reported to the House by the Committee on Commerce, providing for a subsidy to be paid by the Government to the Pacific Cable Company, a distinct corporation from the Commercial Pacific Cable Company. Permit me here to explain that the Pacific Cable Company was organized by Mr. James M. Scrymser, who is the owner of the cables connecting our country with Central and South America, and who is one of the leading cable men of the world. Mr. Scrymser's companies are all on friendly terms with the Western Union Telegraph Company, and they have some kind of a traffic arrangement with the latter company. The Commercial Pacific Cable Company is an offspring of the Commercial Cable and Postal Telegraph Company, the principal owner of which is Mr. John W. Mackay, who is one of the leading financiers of the world interested in cable companies. In one sense, therefore, the Pacific Cable Company may be said to have been organized in the interest of the Western Union, and the Commercial Pacific Cable Company in the interest of the Commercial and Postal Company.

No further action was taken by the House in the Fifty-fourth Congress on the cable bill. I entered in the Fifty-fifth Congress and was assigned to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. That committee in the Fifty-fifth Congress reported in favor of a bill granting to the Pacific Cable Company a subsidy of $100,000 per year for twenty years on condition that that company should construct a cable from the United States to Japan and China and should carry messages of the Government of the United States free forever. I joined at that time with the majority of the committee in making a favorable report on the bill. I think now it was an unfortunate thing for the country that that bill was not enacted into law. It never was taken up for consideration in the House, but if it had been made a law the United States would now be in the position to have its Government messages carried for all time across the Pacific for the sum of $2,000,000, distributed in payments for twenty years. As a matter of fact our Government has paid since that bill was reported to the House, in March, 1898, for cable messages to the Far East about two-thirds of this total sum of $2,000,000. It seems to me that the same shortsightedness which is now fighting the present proposition for a Government cable is no wiser now than it was in 1898, when it prevented consideration of the bill at that time.

In the Fifty-sixth or last Congress the same committee reported a bill favorably providing for the payment of a subsidy of not to exceed $300,000 a year for twenty years to a private company which should construct the Pacific cable, and in exchange such company should carry Government messages free during the period of twenty years. That bill provided for public advertising by the Postmaster-General, with the direction that contract for the subsidy should be made with the corporation making the most favorable bid, which should not, however, exceed the subsidy of $300,000 a year. No further action was taken in the House on this bill in the Fifty-sixth Congress. Several members of our committee filed minority views protesting against the payment of this large subsidy to a private corporation and urging that the Pacific cable should be constructed, owned, and operated by the National Government. This bill in the Fifty-sixth Congress was urged by the Pacific Cable Company and the Western Union interests. It was well understood that if the bill became a law Mr. Scrymser's Pacific Cable Company expected to be the beneficiary and to obtain the contract.

It has been quite evident from the start that if any private company should construct the Pacific cable from our shores it must be done by some company which is an ally either of the Western Union or the Postal Telegraph Company or by a combination of both interests. The greatest cable company of the world is the one known as the Eastern Extension Company. It now practically controls the entire cable situation in the Far East. It claims to have exclusive rights for the laying of cable lines on the Philippine Islands, as well as on the coast of China and elsewhere. During the last summer Mr. Mackay, in the interest of the Commercial Cable and Postal Telegraph Company, undoubtedly for the purpose of securing an advantage to that company to the exclusion of the Western Union, obtained some sort of an understanding with the Eastern Extension Company which he considered very favorable, and thereupon announced that he would build a cable across the Pacific, and the Commercial Pacific Cable Company was organized for that purpose.

It is not to be wondered at that the Postal Telegraph Company did not desire that an ally of the Western Union Company should build the Pacific cable and thereby give preference to the Western Union over the Postal on all business with the Far East. Nor is it to be wondered at now that the Western Union Company is very much opposed to the construction of the Pacific cable by an ally of the Postal Telegraph Company, which may shut the Western Union largely out of the Pacific business. I think both of these two great companies have shown considerable diligence in the matter of attempting to construct a Pacific cable.

When it was quite clear that very little cable business would be secured directly from our Government, and before we had acquired the Philippines, with the increase of both military and commercial messages, the Western Union, or its ally, was offering to construct the cable on exceedingly liberal terms. Now Mr. Mackay's company is offering to construct the cable and take its chances. I have no stones to throw at Mr. Mackay or his company. If this Congress shall determine for any reason that it will not direct the construction of a Government cable, then I hope it will deal properly and leniently with this company, the Commercial Pacific Cable Company, and will put no obstructions in their road.

It is desirable that a cable across the Pacific be laid, and I am not in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], which is that this Government shall not build a cable itself, but shall interfere in such a way as will probably prevent Mr. Mackay's company from building a private cable. If our Government does not wish to build the cable itself, it certainly ought to do nothing which will tend to prevent the construction of the cable by a private company, and the conditions which the gentleman from Pennsylvania would impose upon this private company are both onerous and unfair.

I wish to direct the attention of the members for a moment to the large map of the world which is here in front. It was an uncolored copy of Cram's Map of the World, which is the best map published. I have colored it for the purpose of calling attention, in a striking manner, to the ownership in and about the Pacific Ocean. You will see here colored in red the United States and its territories and possessions. You will see colored in blue a portion of the British possessions. China is colored in black, and you will notice that just south of China lies the British territory of India and also territory belonging to France. Immediately south of the Chinese Sea are a large number of islands which belong to Holland, and are colored in green. Easterly are the Caroline and Marshall islands and other islands belonging to the German Government. East from Australia are several groups of islands belonging to the French Republic, though the great majority of the islands in the South Pacific are colored here in blue, which indicates that they are possessions of the British Government. You will notice that Japan, which is colored in yellow, has territory in islands stretching almost from the Aleutian Islands, or western part of Alaska, down to the southern point of China.

The Pacific Ocean to-day has no cable stretching across it, but it is easily seen from this examination of the map that Great Britain, Germany, France, Holland, Japan, and the United States are contesting for commercial supremacy in the Pacific Ocean, and may at any time contest for military or naval supremacy. Not any of the other countries is so fortunately situated as the United States for the construction of a national cable across the Pacific. The Navy of the United States has made exhaustive surveys for a line of cable, and I direct your attention to the course of the cable, whether it shall be constructed by our own Government or by a private corporation. The route of the cable is shown by the red line on the map across the ocean. The first stretch of the cable will be from San Francisco to Honolulu, a distance of 2,084 knots, or nautical miles, a nautical mile having a length of 6,086 feet as against 5,280 feet for the ordinary statute mile. The average depth of the water from San Francisco to Honolulu is 2,700 fathoms, and the maximum depth 3,200 fathoms.

The next stretch of the cable is from Honolulu to Midway Islands, 1,100 knots, with a maximum depth of 3,000 fathoms. The next stretch is from Midway Islands to Guam, a distance of about 2,280 knots, with a maximum depth over the route selected of 3,382 fathoms. The next stretch is from Guam to the island of Luzon, a distance of 1,372 knots, with a maximum depth of 3,200 fathoms. It is necessary to have landing places and cable stations on the Midway islands and on the island of Guam, for the reason that a cable stretch of over 3,000 knots is too long for very efficient work. A cable stretch of greater length requires a very heavy cable wire in order to obtain efficient electrical transmission, and it then becomes too heavy to lift from the bottom of the sea. The total cable distance from San Francisco to Dingala Bay, on the island of Luzon, is a little less than 7,000 knots, but in laying cable it is necessary to make an allowance for slack or waste, and it is probable that the total length required in order to lay the cable from San Francisco to Luzon will be about 8,000 knots.

The British Government has now under construction the British Pacific cable, which will extend from Vancouver Island, immediately north of the State of Washington, to Australia. The route of the British cable is indicated on the map before us by the blue line. It runs from Vancouver Island to Fanning Island, from Fanning Island to the Fiji Islands, from the Fiji Islands to Norfolk Island, and from there to Queensland. That portion of the cable between Queensland and the Fiji Islands has already been constructed and the entire line has been contracted for. The length of the British cable is 8,272 knots, and the contract price of the cable, laid and guaranteed, is $8,975,000. The longest stretch of the British cable is from Vancouver Island to Fanning Island, a distance of about 3,200 knots, without including "slack" necessary in the laying of the cable. This is a much longer stretch than any on the proposed American cable, and it is so long a stretch that it will seriously interfere with the rapid transmission of messages, as was fully understood and set forth by the commission which reported in favor of the construction of the cable.

Many gentleman here are undoubtedly afraid that the cost of the cable will far exceed any present estimate. Let me reassure such gentlemen. A cable to-day is a staple article. Its cost is not hard to determine. There are three great cable making and laying companies in the world, all located in London. These great companies sell cable lines made, laid, and guaranteed. The price of the English cable, as fixed by the contract for its making and laying, is just about the estimate for that cable, and is also just about the estimated cost for the American cable. The British cable is a few hundred knots longer than the American cable, and there is every reason to believe that our Government could make a contract to-day for the making, laying, and guaranteeing of a cable from San Francisco to the island of Luzon for less than $8,500,000.

The Commercial Pacific Cable Company has made a contract for the making and laying of the cable from San Francisco to Honolulu for $2,224,226. The distance, with slack included, is estimated at about 2,400 knots. This is less than $1,000 per knot, and on the same basis the cost of the cable clear through to the Philippines would be several hundred thousand dollars less than $8,000,000. To this cost must be added, of course, the cost of 5 cable stations on the route, which would be not to exceed the sum of $100,000 or $200,000 for all of them. The only other cost would be to provide the necessary cable-repair ships. Whoever builds the Pacific cable will probably have to maintain two cable-repair ships, one at each end of the line. These repair ships will cost from $300,000 to $500,000 each.

Our Government already owns a cable-repair ship in the Philippines, so that it would not be necessary to provide a new one there if the Government builds the cable. We now own about 1,200 miles of cable between the different islands in the Philippines, which has been laid and is now operated by the Signal Corps of the Army for military and commercial messages; and in connection with our cables there the Army owns and maintains a cable-repair ship which is capable of picking up and repairing any ocean cable.

The total cost, therefore, of a cable from San Francisco to Manila, constructed by the Government or by contract with the Government, would not exceed $9,000,000. This is not much more than the cost of a protected cruiser for the Navy. A Government cable in time of war, and particularly in time when war was imminent or was only threatened, across the Pacific, would be worth more for military purposes than several additional naval vessels of any class.

The officers of the Army and the Navy who have testified before our committee have all urged the ownership of the cable by our Government, for the special reason that it would give to our country a great military and naval advantage in time of proposed or actual war. We passed a naval bill in the House recently of about $80,000,000 for the next year. We passed an Army bill recently of about $100,000,000 for the next year. A Pacific cable owned and operated by our Government would be worth more to us than anything which any $10,000,000 can be spent for in the Army or any $10,000,000 can be spent for in the Navy, or both together. We pour out money on the Army and Navy as though we were dipping water out of the ocean to pour into rat holes.

We spend money for military and naval purposes as freely as though we were drunken sailors, but here is a proposition for a Pacific cable, which will have a value of more than $10,000,000 to the Army in time of war and a value of more than $10,000,000 to the Navy in time of war, and yet about this we hesitate and doubt, because, forsooth, in time of peace we can make some actual use of the cable for commercial purposes. It is true that our Government may seize the cable in time of war, even though constructed by the private company, by the payment of exorbitant sums, as we did in the Spanish war when we paid $2,000 a day for the cable running from New York to Haiti. It is also true that the Government could not seize the cable before hostilities were actually declared, although it might be much more important to have control of it before war was actually declared than afterwards.

But it is urged that it will be a great expense upon the Government to operate a Pacific cable, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON], in his speech against the bill, read from the report of our Committee on Commerce of the last Congress that it would cost the Government $1,500,000 a year to operate a Government cable.

Mr. Chairman, when the majority of our committee made that report two years ago it did not pretend to claim that it would cost the Government substantially any more to operate the cable than it would a private company. The committee in the same report estimated that the gross receipts which might be expected from a Pacific cable between the United States, China, and Japan at a reduced rate of $1 per word would not exceed the sum of $583,000. The extreme silliness of the estimate then made of the cost of operation of the cable, to wit, $1,500,000 per annum, is shown by the fact that the committee thought that the private company could afford to construct such a cable at an annual cost for operation of $1,500,000 and annual receipts which could not exceed $583,000.

It is perfectly evident to anyone that the actual cost of operating a cable is very small. There is nothing to call for much expenditure. On the Pacific cable there will be five stations and a few operators. The expense of the operators and the maintenance of the stations can not be made large. It is not likely that under the most extravagant management the annual expense of operation could equal $150,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Alabama knows that I am pressed for time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But the gentleman is talking about us. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I prefer not to yield until later. I will endeavor to anticipate the gentleman's question. In addition to the actual cost of operation there is the cost of maintenance of the two repair ships. It is true we are already maintaining one in the Philippines, but if the cost of both were charged against the Pacific cable it would be about $200,000 a year, as the testimony shows that the estimate for maintaining a cable repair ship is about $100,000 a year, though my information is that the repair ship now maintained by us in the Philippines costs for maintenance far less than that amount. That makes $325,000 a year. There is no other cost of operation except the possible cost of repairing a break in the cable.

About this no one can tell absolutely, but the private companies constructing a cable of this character would figure upon the possibility of an annual expense for cable repairs of about $100,000 a year. There is far less likelihood of a cable breaking in the Pacific than in the Atlantic Ocean, for various reasons. But a modern cable, well made and well laid, is not at all likely to break, though it may do so. The actual cost of operating the cable, including the maintenance of two repair ships and any breakage, would not exceed $425,000 per year. Of course I have not included in this calculation the saving up of a fund for the renewal of the cable at the end of thirty or forty years, or interest upon the cost of the cable.

But I particularly desire to call the attention of the members of the House to the fact that in the ownership and operation of the cable by its very nature there is but little where private enterprise or ownership can carry on the work any cheaper than the Government can. The proposition before the House now does not require that the Government itself shall make the cable or that it shall lay the cable. It can purchase a cable made and laid. There is no way by which it can cost the Government much more to operate the cable than it will cost the most economical and stingy private company.

I call your attention to the past, present, and prospective future cable rates of the Far East. In his testimony before our committee in January, 1900, Captain Squier, assistant to the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, testified that the commercial rate at that time from Washington to Manila was $2.38 per word, and that the Government rate was $2.25 per word, but that for special messages, which had the right of way, a rate of three times those amounts was charged. He also testified that the rate then from London to the island of Luzon was $2.10 per word; from London to offices in China, $1.35 per word; from London to Japan via the northern or Siberian route, $1.51 per word; via the eastern or Indo route, $1.90 per word.

In January of this year, in his testimony before our committee, Mr. George G. Ward, vice-president of the Commercial Pacific Cable Company, testified that since that company had been organized and had proposed to construct a Pacific cable the rate from Washington to Manila had been reduced from $2.37 per word to $1.66 per word, and that the latter rate was the rate in force at the time he testified. That means the rate to the public. The Government rate is a trifle less, though there is no very substantial difference between the Government rate and the rate for commercial messages. It must be remembered that in cable messages both the name of the sender and the name and address to which sent are included as words to be paid for.

The name and address to which sent naturally constitutes, and under the rules of the cable companies must constitute, at least two words; so that if a message is signed by the sender, as it must ordinarily be, a cable message consisting of one word of message actually constitutes four words in fixing the cost. A cable message from Washington to Manila to-day, therefore, of only one word of message will cost $6.64. It is quite true that in ordinary cable business the cable code is very generally used, so that much can be said with few words, and yet a cable message of a number of words is usually required, and even a message of many words is often necessary. Under the reduced rate of to-day, which is $1.66 per word, a 10-word commercial message from Washington to Manila costs $21.58. The proposition of the Commercial Pacific Cable Company is that it will carry messages between San Francisco and Manila and between San Francisco and China or Japan at the rate of $1 per word. This will make a message of one word cost $4 and a message of ten words cost $13.

Before Mr. Mackay's Commercial Cable Company commenced business across the Atlantic cable messages across the Atlantic cost 50 cents per word. When the Commercial Cable Company opened for business it precipitated a rate war between that company and the Western Union which carried the cost down to 12½ cents per word. At the end of the rate war, by understanding between the Atlantic cable companies, the rate was fixed at 25 cents per word, where it has remained to the present time.

Now, I call your attention to the nature of the cable and the cable business. There is nothing about a cable which wears out through use in sending messages. It is no damage to a cable to operate it continuously to its fullest capacity. Its life is not in any way affected by the amount of traffic transmitted. Its use does not require a heavy fuel expense, nor the wear and tear of machinery, nor even any special extra expense of employees. A cable across the Pacific must have its offices at each end open for business all of the time, and can not even stop for night, because when it is day on this side of the Pacific it is night on the other side. It is true that it will require a few more operators and employees to carry on a very heavy business than it will a very light cable business, but the increase in the cost of operating a cable continuously over that of operating it but a few times during the course of the twenty-four hours of the day is slight and is hardly worth consideration.

In hearings before our Committee on Commerce recently in regard to the regulation of freight rates on railroads, it was testified by one of the leading railroad experts of the country that the present theory of railroad transportation is to secure the largest amount of traffic business on the ground that the fixed charges are the same whether the amount of traffic is large or small, and that a railroad can afford to carry through traffic at lower rates than would produce a net income if the same rates were applied to all traffic. In other words, that a railroad company now endeavors to obtain any traffic not necessarily tributary to its line at some low rate which only needs to exceed the actual operating expense in order to bring a profit to the railroad. If this theory be correct in regard to railroads, it is much more so in regard to a long cable where nearly all of the expenses, both of the fixed charges and of operation, are incurred, even though not so many as a dozen messages per day pass over the cable.

It is pertinent, then, to ask what is the capacity of a single cable. The British Pacific cable now being laid has a core of 552 pounds of copper and 368 pounds of gutta-percha per knot. It is admitted by all parties that the American cable across the Pacific will have substantially the same core of copper, and that the size of the copper core, together with the length of any stretch of the cable, determines the speed of transmission. The pending bill requires that the cable to be laid shall be equal to the transmission of 130 letters per minute one way. This will be substantially accomplished by a core of the size indicated over the longest stretch of the cable, which is between the Midway Islands and Guam. But if we figure the full capacity of the cable at 125 letters per minute one way, that would give, us under the duplex system of transmitting messages each way at the same time, 250 letters per minute.

Of course this would not mean that that number of letters for pay messages could be transmitted during any considerable period, because there is more or less transmission of service messages, etc. The usual estimate for service messages and other dead traffic, waste, etc., is 20 to 30 per cent; but if we make a discount of 50 per cent for full measure it would leave the capacity of the cable at 125 letters per minute, counting both ways. With a little further discount this is equal to 15 words of 8 letters each per minute, 900 words per hour, 21,600 words per day, and 7,884,000 pay words of 8 letters each per year. Captain Squier in his testimony figured the total carrying capacity in paying code words of 8 letters each, allowing 30 per cent for waste, at 11,800,000 words per annum. So that I think it might safely be assumed that my estimate of 7,884,000 words is safe and conservative.

Now, the utmost that the private company proposes to do is to reduce cable rates between our shores and China to $1 per word, charging the same amount for messages to Manila. The private cable companies figure upon the basis that only those persons will use the cable who are compelled for commercial reasons to send business messages without much regard to the cost of the message, though it is true they figure some increased business by reason of the reduction of the rate to $1 per word. It is not likely that the Commercial Pacific Cable Company, if it constructs its private line as now proposed, will reduce the rate below $1 per word.

The officials of that company admit that they have an understanding with the Eastern Extension Company, which now controls the cable business in the Far East. They admit, further, that the American company proposes to depend upon the Eastern Extension Company for its connections between Manila and China and Japan. This is an admission that there will not be any competition. It sufficiently appears from the evidence before our committee that the Commercial Pacific Cable Company has an understanding with the Eastern Extension Company that the former will not compete with the latter for business between Europe and China, so that the Pacific Cable Company will practically only engage in business between America and the Far East. There will not, therefore, be any occasion for competition. If the Government does not build the cable, but leaves its construction and ownership to the Commercial Pacific Cable Company, the rate between San Francisco and the Philippines, China, and Japan will be $1 per word, and it will not be reduced below that amount.

In this matter we are furnished an instructive lesson by the British Government. The British Pacific cable is a trifle longer than the proposed American cable. Its longest stretch, with slack included, will be about 3,600 miles, and this long stretch, which will be the longest cable stretch in the world, is so long that electrical transmissions over it will be very slow. It is estimated by the experts that more than twice as many words per minute can be successfully transmitted over the American Pacific cable than can be transmitted over the British Pacific cable. The efficiency of the British cable, therefore, is no more than half that of the American line. The actual cost of transmission per message, therefore, over the British line ought to be considerably greater than over the American line, if not, in fact, twice as much. But what are the facts? The British Government proposes to carry messages over the British cable, from one end to the other, for 50 cents per word. The American company proposes to charge a dollar a word for carrying messages an equal distance over a cable which will work twice as rapidly.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to show that the cost of a Pacific cable to be owned by our Government is well ascertained and is not exorbitant; that the cost of operation is small, is about the same for many messages as it is for few, and is not greater if operated by the Government than if operated by a private company.

I am in favor, sir, of a cable owned and operated by our Government, first, for strategic reasons in international complications and in military and naval operations, and, second, for public utility and benefit. I think that the Pacific cable should be operated as a part of our postal system. We carry letters to Alaska and deliver them through great expense to points far away from the sea and from railroad. I have been informed by officials of the Post-Office Department that mail has frequently been carried to Alaska at a cost to the Government of more than $1 per letter when the postage received was only 2 cents per letter.

There are many places in the western portion of our country where mail is carried daily by the Government to post-offices 150 miles away from railroad transportation at a high cost to the Government. In such cases the amount of mail matter carried is very small and the cost per letter is many times the amount of the postage. Long before there were railroads or telegraph lines to our Pacific coast mail matter was carried by the Government to our people in California and Oregon. The cost of carrying that mail matter was many times the amount received by the Government as postage.

But I dare say, sir, that if mail had not been carried by the Government between our Pacific coast and the rest of the Union; if railroads and telegraph lines had not been built across the continent and over the Rocky Mountains by Government aid, the people on the other side of those mountains would have become estranged from the rest of our country, would have formed views and ambitions apart from those of our more Eastern people, and would probably at some time long before this have established a government of their own, which could easily have been maintained by them against our then power. We do not pretend that our post-office system shall be made profitable financially. We have recently introduced on an extensive scale rural free delivery and almost every ounce of mail matter which is delivered in the country by the rural carriers is handled at a considerable loss by Government in excess of the amount of postage paid. The annual deficit in the Post-Office Department would build the entire Pacific cable.

Mr. Chairman, we have before this Congress two propositions pending in regard to the future of the Philippine Islands. The Republican policy contemplates the probability of those islands remaining a possession of the United States—at least for many years to come. The proposition submitted by the Democratic minority here is that while the Philippine Islands shall be guaranteed independence, they shall ever remain under the protecting influence of the United States. Whichever policy may be the one ultimately adopted by our country, it becomes of the utmost importance that the people of this country and the people of the Philippine Islands shall remain on terms of closest friendship and shall be able, by means of easy and cheap communication, to understand and appreciate the feelings, desires, and ambitions of each other.

We are to-day maintaining a form of civil government in the Philippines, and also a considerable army there. The most dread disease which attacks our American people over there, whether in civil or military life, is homesickness. There is practically no news from the United States received or published in the papers in the Philippines. There is, in fact, a great dearth of news in our country in regard to the Philippines. Not only the Government here should be in daily contact with the government over there, but the people in the Philippine Islands, whether native or American, should have a means of cheap daily communication with the people of this country. This is equally important whether we retain the Philippines as a possession or only maintain a protectorate over them.

Mr. Chairman, it is inevitable that there shall be a conflict of civilizations across the Pacific Ocean. In the view of history and civilization China is a sleeping giant. She is likely to be awakened by the pins which are being stuck into her along her eastern coast. Whether when she is really reawakened she will rise as a mighty power in the commerce of the world or whether she will die as a nation and be torn into pieces by the European nations we can not foresee. It is almost inevitable that something like one of these contingencies will occur. Meantime we are grasping for our share of Far Eastern trade. It is our duty to become the controlling military and naval power of the North Pacific Ocean. It is our duty to endeavor to largely increase our commerce with the Far East. The most important feature in deciding these questions will be rapid communication. If the Commercial Company builds its Pacific cable, its rate of charges will prohibit any messages except important Government business or pressing commercial messages.

Now, the proposition which I submit is this: The cable is capable of transmitting 7,884,000 paying words of 8 letters each per annum. If kept continuously in operation, it would amount, at 10 cents per word, to $788,400. This is an amount far in excess of the cost of maintenance and operation. It would be easy to make a classification of the business to a certain extent. Telegraph business is now classified, more or less. There are day messages and night messages, repeated messages, press messages, etc. There is no reason why a Pacific-cable business should not be classified and differential rates established. It would be easy, for instance, to make a rate of 10 cents per word, with an agreement that the message should be carried through as soon as reached in regular order, or say, within one, two, or three days, and it would be easy to make a much higher rate on business which should have the right of way, just as is now done on the present cable business to the Far East.

To carry on business by cable at the present time with the Philippines or with China costs an excessive sum. It will still cost an excessive sum when the rate is put down to $1 per word. It takes now nearly two months to send a letter to Manila and to receive a reply. It will still take nearly two months after the Commercial Pacific Cable Company is doing business if no Government cable is laid. The length of time required in the one case and the excessive expense in the other will greatly retard, if it does not prevent, our obtaining our share of good will, knowledge, and business in dealing with the people of the Philippines and the other people of the Far East. We can afford to build a cable and carry messages over it at the rate of 10 cents per word without losing money. In my opinion, we could afford to do this even if it were done at an annual loss of a few hundred thousand dollars.

I know, sir, that the principal objection to our proposition is that the Government ought not to enter into private business in competition with private concerns. Many gentlemen here fear that if the Government owns a cable it will lead to Government ownership of the telegraph lines and other cable lines. Mr. Chairman, it could only lead to a thought of that thing if the operation by our Government of a Pacific cable should prove most successful. If it did not prove successful, then no one would wish to extend the experiment. If it did prove successful, then that of itself is a sufficient reason for laying the Pacific cable. I have no fear of Government ownership of the railway lines or the telegraph lines. What the future may develop no one can tell, but certainly, as our Government is constituted to-day, it would be the height of folly for the Government to become the owner and operator of the telegraph lines and railroads of the country. And there is not the slightest danger of that during the life of the present generation, whether a Pacific cable be operated successfully by our Government or not. The Pacific cable is sui generis. It stands by itself, much like the proposed isthmian or interoceanic canal, and for much the same reasons.

Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that when the Government first undertook the transmission of the mails that objection was made to it that the Government proposed to enter upon a business which might better be left to the private mail carriers then in vogue. There may be those who believe that postal matter would be carried better and for less cost to the senders if it were now done by private corporations, but I am not one of those. I do not shrink from this undertaking because it may demonstrate the possibilities of cheap cable communication, and thereby make our people wish the Government to own Atlantic cables. The future development of our country will probably far exceed our present understanding or conception.

That the East will develop greatly is of course assumed, but the great West, Mr. Chairman, will have the greatest development.

When we shall have constructed a canal across the Panama Isthmus; when we shall have stored the waters of the Rocky Mountains and spread them at seasonable periods over the fertile but arid lands of the plains below; when we shall have cheap and rapid communication with our possessions and the peoples of other countries in the Far East; when we shall have trade across the Pacific with the hundreds of millions of people on the other side thereof, whom we now consider barbarians, but who have developed a civilization of a different type, though possibly equal in refinement to our own; when our country shall have lived, not merely a century and a quarter, but shall have survived and grown in greatness for two centuries—nay, perhaps three—then, sir, the eastern coast of the Pacific, on the other side of the Rockies, will possess the commercial seaports of the world, and in the center of our country, with nerves reaching in responsive touch to every portion of the world, both of the West and the East, will stand the pride of our people, the commercial metropolis of the world, the center of great undertakings, the school of art and refinement, the axis of development, progress, trade, and thought—the city of Chicago. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I desire to move to strike out the enacting clause. Is that motion debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. That motion will not be in order until after the first section is read.

The first section of the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be constructed, maintained, and operated by the United States a submarine cable or cables and connecting land lines from the city of San Francisco, Cal., to the city of Honolulu, in the Hawaiian Islands, and thence to Manila, P. I., by the way of Midway or Wake Island and the island of Guam, or by whatever route may be determined to be the most practicable by the President.

The first amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 5 of section 1 strike out "city of San Francisco" and insert "coast of."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause. Is it in order to debate that motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the doubt which has been expressed here as to whether the Commercial Pacific Cable Company is actually proceeding with the work undertaken, I ask that two telegrams which I send to the desk be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LONDON, June 11, 1902.

COOK (for HEPBURN), Washington, D. C.:

I hereby certify that 1,065 nautical miles of cable, which is to be laid between San Francisco and Honolulu, was manufactured up to yesterday, and that said cable is being made at the rate of 26 miles per day.

G. G. WARD,
Vice-President Commercial Pacific Cable Company.

LONDON, June 11, 1902.

HEPBURN, Chairman, Washington:

My company begs to inform you that it has already manufactured 1,065 nautical miles of submarine cable which we are to lay between San Francisco and Honolulu for the Commercial Pacific Cable Company, and the balance is being made at the rate of 25 miles per day, and our steamer Silvertown will sail with said cable on or about the 1st August next.

ROBERT K. GRAY,
Managing Director of the India Rubber and Gutta Percha Telegraph Works Company.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the consideration of this bill has further convinced me that this is another of the "mad dogs" mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], which ought to have its tail speedily cut off just back of its ears. Therefore I make this motion. Nor is the situation improved at all by the prospect of the scheme proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. I do not care to open the question of protection here, but I have always understood that protection was advocated in behalf of developing an industry at home which could not be developed otherwise. The proposition here is "protection run mad," proposing to prostitute the powers and functions of the Government to drive private capital from a legitimate field already occupied.

The same parties are behind both the propositions, respectively offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. Before our committee the question was fully ventilated as to paying a bonus to patriotic citizens to induce them to give us the spectacle of their growing rich, one dozen or two people, at the expense of the other 75,000,000, at a bonus of 20 per cent. I not only developed by some of those people that they could build as cheaply, or 10 per cent more cheaply than the foreigners could furnish the material, but when I called their attention to a thing then current in the newspapers, that Irish potatoes were scarce and the farmers were getting a high price for them in the vicinity of Pittsburg, New York, and Philadelphia, and I asked the gentleman insisting on the bonus if they thought it patriotic to ship potatoes over from Europe and eat them at a lower price to keep our farmers from getting a higher price, he did not think my question was in order; it was not pertinent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, no matter which proposition prevails, in either event the necessity for a cable would not be met. Commerce wants a cable right now. It is clearly and conclusively demonstrated beyond all doubt that there is no company here now capable of immediate production of cable which the Army and Navy would accept as good for so long a distance, as testified to by Admiral Bradford; and if it is going to take three or four years to develop a plant, to build up a manufacturing system, to acquire the cable ships, and to lay the cables which would be necessary under either of the schemes of the gentleman from Michigan or the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the necessity would have passed, commerce would have suffered, the uses of the Government would not have been subserved, and we would have committed a tyrannical abuse and have been guilty of the ignominy of having pulled down the powers of government and prostituted them to driving out capital from legitimate enterprise in order to enrich a few selfish people.

I am not misled, nor do I believe this committee is misled, by the balderdash about monopoly. It depends on who is doing the monopolizing. These people want the Government first, they state before the committee, to build to Manila and spend its money to liquidate concessions, so they could have the monopoly from there to China instead of these other people. We contend that this Government ought to keep out of the field. Let everybody who wants to build cables do so, and if we have a hundred there is competition and better business. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say a word on this cable question, but I am going to take four or five minutes to speak about it as a business proposition, without any regard to the political side of it, or the Philippine side of it, or anything of the kind. A cable from San Francisco to Honolulu is needed. There are 160,000 people there, and about 3,000 of them are either American citizens or the descendants of people who were connected with American people. It will not pay; it must be run in connection with something else in order to get the money back. Gentlemen, I would rather run a peanut stand on a corner of the Bowery as a matter of profit than to run that cable, if it was given to me, so far as business is concerned.

Now, it will not pay to Honolulu. Everybody in this House knows that, but they have got to have it; we have got to have that connection. Now, you run on to Midway, a rock in the middle of the ocean, uninhabited, and always will be; and you run on still farther to Guam, and you have an island 6 miles wide and 29 miles long, with 6,000 Indians on it who have been there 300 years and who have now 1 per cent of that island cultivated. Their exports last year were $16,000. How much business are you going to get for your cable out of that? Nothing. It is perfectly absurd. As a naval station, by and by, when the Government gets ready to use it as a naval station, it may be instrumental, effectively instrumental, as a part of defense, but as a business proposition there is nothing in it. You go on farther and come to the Philippine Islands, and you have six or eight million people there; probably seven million out of the eight do not know what a telegraph is, do not know what a cable is, and are absolutely ignorant of anything of the kind. You will get some business from the Philippine Islands.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. After you have thoroughly educated those people as you propose to do, will they not transact business?

Mr. HILL. But where is your interest upon the cost of your cable when you get that done? You had better stand to one side and let somebody else build it. When you get to Manila you stop. That is a Government enterprise, and the only hope of anybody getting any return, Mr. Mackay or anybody else, out of this enterprise is by connection with these other companies, unless you go further. Now, I have heard a good deal about the enormously extravagant prices charged for cablegrams. I cabled home from Manila last summer a three-word message for $2.65.

Mr. BUTLER. How many words did the gentleman send? I should like to say to him that I tried to cable there yesterday, and they wanted to charge me a good deal more than that.

Mr. HILL. I sent the address and one word, which was a cipher-code word, just as everybody will do. Nobody is going to undertake to send a speech for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in a cable message.

Mr. BUTLER. That depends on the size and length of your pocketbook. I made the attempt yesterday to send a cable message to Manila, and they wanted to charge me $10.86 for five words.

Mr. HILL. The customers of this cable company will use a cable code, of course. I sent all I wanted to send for $2.65. Now, what have you got as a business proposition? You have an absolutely worthless financial enterprise unless you can connect it up with these other lines. Are you going to have the United States Government go into partnership with the Eastern Cable Company? Are you going to have the United States Government go into partnership with the Danish Cable Company?

Now, let me tell you another thing. When you get there you have got the competition of the cable lines around by India and of new telegraph lines which are constructed overland. I telegraphed overland from Valadivostock to New York for 60 cents a word. I had the choice between that or 90 cents a word around by cable by the East India line. So you have competition there, and where would your Government be, owning that cable, with these competing lines sending messages the other way from Manila? It is an absolutely worthless proposition, gentlemen, for the United States Government to go into under any circumstances whatever. John W. Mackay or some other man can do that, and by going into partnership with those people it will be a legitimate business enterprise, but competition is already established there by two or three different lines. The Russian Government have their own lines across Siberia, and will send messages at a lower rate to-day than they are sent by cable. As I just told you, the rate is 60 cents a word overland from Valadivostock against 90 cents a word by the cable. Figure it out for yourselves. There is nothing in it for anybody unless they can form a partnership with these other people. So if you put your money into this proposition, gentlemen, you will throw it away. [Applause.]

Mr. TOMPKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, being a member of the committee to which this bill was referred, and which committee gave the subject-matter careful and considerate examination, I feel it proper for me to add a few words upon the pending subject.

It has been contended here that the Government, in undertaking such an enterprise as this, must depart from its old moorings and invade a new field for the exercise of governmental powers, and that such exercise would be in conflict with the well-settled policy of government. If I remember correctly what I have read, a great question was discussed a number of years ago in the Senate of the United States by men of no less distinction than Haynes of South Carolina, and Webster of Massachusetts, as to the power of this Government to assist, encourage, and foster commerce between the States.

The power so to do was, to my mind, clearly settled in that great debate. Moreover, the Congress of the United States engaged in constructing the great national pike leading from the East to the West. It is also in consonance with the power of the Government to establish post roads, to carry communications between citizens, and whatsoever may aid and encourage commerce between citizens of the different States Congress has the power to do.

It has also been clearly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, as shown by the citation offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], that Congress has the power to construct telegraph lines and to assist commerce in that way. Now, if it has the power to construct telegraph lines between the States, it has the power to construct telegraph lines between its different possessions, even though the water may intervene. It is not a question whether the line shall be upon the land or whether it shall be upon the sea, but the only question is, Will the line connect citizens of the United States and encourage commerce between them?

One of the principal reasons urged in behalf of this bill has emanated from the Executive Department of this Government, and it is based upon the proposition that the United States Government should at all times be in quick communication with its possessions and have control of those lines of communication. England, Germany, and France either have built or are now engaged in extending cables to all their outlying possessions, and this has not been done nor is it being done because those respective governments expect to obtain any profit from the enterprise, but it is for the purpose of enabling the mother government, or those in authority in the seat of government, to be in quick and certain communication with all their citizens and all their possessions.

It has been alleged that it is not a practical enterprise, because the United States can not make any money out of it. Well, I do not understand, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that the Government of the United States ever goes into any enterprise for the purpose of making money. I do not understand that it would engage in mercantile pursuits or the manufacture of different articles for the market in order that profit might inure to the Government.

I understand the sole purpose of the Government to be that of the protection of its citizens, the fostering of their welfare, and encouraging all legitimate enterprises. There has not been a session of Congress since this Government was founded that it has not been necessary for Congress to make an appropriation to meet deficiencies in the Post-Office Department session after session, year after year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman, who is a member of the committee, may have his time extended ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOMPKINS of Ohio. I thank the committee for its indulgence.

We are confronted here, and other members have been, session after session with a deficiency in the Post-Office Department amounting to millions, and nobody ever questions the propriety as to making the appropriation, nor does anybody want to talk of reducing and cutting down the postal system of this Government. Now, what is the difference in principle? Why is the Government authorized to maintain a postal department? Why does it maintain a postal department? In order to facilitate communication between the different citizens of the United States, which is absolutely indispensable to the welfare of our people. Now, it seems to me in principle, in effect, the two propositions are in harmony—that we maintain a postal system in this country and maintain a cable system between this country and our outlying possessions.

Now as to the necessity. I cite to this committee the testimony of Governor Taft, taken before a committee of the House. I will read what he said as a part of my remarks:

Mr. HAMILTON. What, in your judgment, would be the effect upon our interests in the Philippine Islands of the construction of a Government cable connecting them with our country?

Governor TAFT. First, as to the construction of a cable. A cable, of course, would not bring the Philippine Islands physically nearer to the United States, but in the sentiment of the people, in the feeling of the Americans who go there, in every other way than in a geographical sense, it would make the bonds between those islands and the United States stronger and nearer, and it would, of course, greatly strengthen that feeling, too, I think, if the cable were built by the Government. But I want to say that the cable with us is the important point.

We should prefer to have a Government cable, but to lose the cable because of a discussion as to whether you should have a Government cable or a cable by private enterprise would seem to us to be a great misfortune. The question of monopoly is one that we run against constantly, and one in respect to which, of course, we feel very impatient. I prefer not to express an opinion on it, but it is claimed by the Eastern Extension Cable Company that they have such a monopoly that nobody can land a cable in the Philippines without their permission. There is a provision in the contract which, if their construction is right, permit the purchase by the Government from them of that monopoly.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you mean by the Eastern Extension Cable Company?

Governor TAFT. The Eastern Extension Cable Company is the company that owns the Hongkong cable. * * * They have two concessions, and they contend that one of the concessions gives them the right to land a cable anywhere in the islands.

* * * * * * *

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The reasons in favor of a Government cable as against a cable owned by private institutions are in the main political?

Governor TAFT. Yes, sir; of course we should expect that the Government cable would be run by the Government here and not by us. We do not want any such responsibility as that.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would serve as a sort of umbilical cord between the islands and the United States?

Governor TAFT. Yes, sir; in case of war it would be important that it should be under Government control. I do not know but that a private cable might be put under Government control in case of necessity or emergency.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HAMILTON. In 1898 this Eastern Extension obtained from Spain an extension of its charter for twenty years, and this extension comprehended the extension of the landing right during the period of twenty years of the cables which might be established to connect all the Spanish possessions in the Pacific Ocean, or to connect them with any other country. Has your attention been called to that?

Governor TAFT. Yes, sir. General Greely told me that the understanding of the Government was excepted out of this grant of monopoly to land a cable from Guam, but it seems that the company claims otherwise, and I have never had occasion to examine into the dispute, because it was not for us to determine. We had not any money to build a Government cable, and we have simply awaited the action of Congress.

Mr. HAMILTON. That would give the Eastern Extension Company the exclusive right to land a cable in the Philippine Islands during that time?

Governor TAFT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMILTON. And that would be contrary to our policy.

Governor TAFT. Unless the right was purchased by the Government as the contract contemplates it may.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HAMILTON. I gather from what you say that you would not regard it as advisable for any private interest to have exclusive privileges in the Philippine Islands?

Governor TAFT. We would much prefer to get rid of all monopolies there, but we want the cable, and we want it as soon as we can get it. While, as between the two, we should prefer a Government cable, we much prefer to have a private cable rather than none at all.

So that it is quite apparent from the testimony of Governor Taft, from the recommendations of Presidents McKinley and Roosevelt, that a cable connecting the United States with the Philippine Islands by way of Honolulu is essential to the welfare of our people. It is not a matter of course. It is not a matter of competing between individuals, but to my mind it is a matter of securing to the Government an undisputed and uninterrupted communication between it and all its possessions.

If a cable is constructed under the Pacific Ocean by a private corporation and its landing rights and communications at the other terminals are held between different and foreign companies, I can not conceive by what right this Government could seize that cable in time of war or in emergency against the wishes of the owners of these connecting cables at the other end. They are under a foreign government, they are upon foreign soil, they are owned by foreign people, and the people of this country have no right to exact or demand any surrender of their rights, however small, should they refuse.

Something has been said about a contract between this Government and a cable company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York. No such contract has been made. An offer has been made to execute such a contract, but I understand that the President and the Secretary of War hold that they have no authority to execute any such contract.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have in this country, as shown by inquiries made in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, two well-established cable-manufacturing plants. They are in operation. One of their officers appeared before our committee and stated that his company was prepared to proceed at once and manufacture a first-class cable that would compare with that manufactured by any other company in the world and furnish it to the Government and let it be laid in the bottom of the Pacific Ocean.

He came there to speak; representing American manufacturers, he came there to appeal to this Congress to foster and encourage an infant industry of the United States, and he said that it would be unfair and unjust to the industry at the head of which he stood if it were denied the right, or the opportunity at least, of furnishing a cable to the United States Government. If we are to protect and foster our citizens in their rights and in their privileges, it seems to me that this certainly falls within the rule, and if American citizens, having American workmen, are prepared to go ahead and make this cable they should be given opportunity to do so.

We are all the time inveighing against monopolies; we are all the time complaining about these great combinations of capital into what are called trusts as being un-American and unfair; and yet there is opposition to this bill, in order that there can be created an absolute monopoly in the cable business between the United States and the Orient. And a monopoly of that character, in times of peace and under the most favorable conditions, might accommodate the people of this country and our Government, yet in times of an emergency, of an exigency, in a time of great importance, that artery of communication between the home Government and our foreign possessions might be severed. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can add anything to the discussion of this question. I have read the bill, I have read the majority report, and I have read the minority report with some care. I have been hearing for some years especially about a cable, and the importance of a cable from the Pacific coast to Honolulu, and since that time the importance of a cable from there to Luzon. I think it is important to have a cable.

I have always been for a cable. The time is not long when gentlemen were agonizing to pay a great subsidy to some company, or to any company, that would build a cable from the Pacific coast to Honolulu—a subsidy of one million, of two millions, and if I am not mistaken in my recollection, three millions, with a subsidy that would run through the years.

I was always opposed to that proposition because I hoped and believed that without waiting too long, perhaps with a small subsidy or none at all, the time would come when we could have a cable laid by the citizens, by private individuals. [Applause.]

Now, I have read the minority report carefully, I may say again. I have talked freely with the chairman of the committee that reported this bill [Mr. HEPBURN]; I have talked with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], and I believe what they say. I do not think anybody disbelieves it. I have not heard anybody dispute that there is a cable company in the United States that have their system practically throughout the length and breadth of our borders, that have perhaps cable lines somewhere down in the Gulf and the Caribbean; that have the money; that have the ships already equipped to lay the cable; that are actually engaged in the manufacture of the cables, and have almost enough made to reach halfway to Honolulu; and without a subsidy, without aid except their own aid, they will lay that cable between this and January 1.

Mr. ADAMSON. By November next.

Mr. CANNON. By November my friend says; but give a little time and make it the 1st of January. If that is so, I do not want this Government to lay a cable to Honolulu at our cost, because I want it as early as it can be given; I want it as early as it can be laid first; and, second, the main thing is the cable; and some gentlemen assure me that this company stands willing to make a bargain that ought to be entirely satisfactory to the United States.

Now, take the other proposition——

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit a question?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I have only five minutes.

Mr. CORLISS. I will yield the gentleman more time.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

Mr. CORLISS. With whom can that company now lawfully make a contract?

Mr. CANNON. I asked the chairman of the committee that question, and under the legislation that has already been had I judge that any company has a right to build a cable from an American shore to an American shore. Now then, I might say, with whom did the French company make a contract, or any other company that has laid cables to this country?

Mr. CORLISS. I will answer that question.

Mr. CANNON. I am trying to answer my friend's question. Second, take the contract that they proffer, and if the proper officer of our Government would sign it, I believe, from information received by members who have studied the question, it would be a binding contract.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. They have made this contract, as the chairman of the committee [Mr. HEPBURN] has stated, under the post-road law of 1866.

Mr. CANNON. Yes. My friend from Alabama is more familiar with the matter than I am. I have not studied this matter carefully; I am not an expert about it. I have got this one fact, that all these years we have waited and have not yet a cable to Honolulu, 2,000 miles away, because we did not want the Government to lay it; because we did not want to pay the two or three million dollar subsidy to lay it, and now I believe the company stands ready to lay it and is constructing it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed to continue his remarks for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. I will tell you if this company lays this cable to Honolulu, there is that much cable laid; then, if they go on farther and lay it to Luzon, there is that much more done. I am informed that this contract can be made, and the gentleman from Iowa assures me that he believes as a lawyer that it is a legal contract and arrangement. I am going to vote for that proposition or for that course that will most certainly bring about that condition. [Applause.]

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has offered a substitute. If I could not do any better, I would vote for that substitute. The principal objection that I have to it is, first, that it involves delay at a time when the harvest is ripe and the husbandman is here ready to reap that harvest. I understand—it is so represented—that we have not the ships, we have not the skill, we are not ready to manufacture the cable. And while I am a protectionist—one of the best, I think, in the country—we have arrived at a time when, in our iron and steel industries and many other industries, we pay half as much more for labor (if not in excess of that) than the world's labor receives elsewhere. And to-day we are a greater manufacturing country than Great Britain and France combined.

Now, then, I think the substitute would involve delay. But if that substitute should pass or not this cable can, before the 1st of January next, be laid to Honolulu. Therefore, as this company comes here and, without money and without price and without subsidy, proposes at its own risk to lay this cable and give us reasonable rates, and to let us fix the rates through our official, the Postmaster-General, every year, and fixes also what the commercial rates shall be, I, for one, am ready to shake hands with those who would promote this enterprise, and I would say: "Go on, and by my vote I will not impede your journey or your work."

Therefore I shall vote to strike out the enacting clause of this bill. That is the best thing, I think, that can be done. [Applause.] If that can not be done, it will be time enough to take another step. I am not in favor of the Government of the United States going into building these cables, because the work can be done better by private parties. [Applause.] I want to leave something for private enterprise and the citizen to do. [Applause.] I would not do anything directly by the Government that could be as well done by the citizen. [Applause.] I thank the committee for its attention.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, owing to the importance of this subject, and in view of the position of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, and his influence upon this House, and the wisdom of his conduct in the past, for which I have great respect,

I ask unanimous consent that I may have at least ten minutes in which to answer him.

Mr. HANBURY. I object.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let him have the time.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will be allowed the ten minutes.

Mr. CORLISS. I appreciate the views expressed by the gentleman from Illinois, because I know he is sincere in what he says. He has in his charge the Treasury of the United States, and he jealously guards its door. And I sympathize generally with his efforts. Sometimes I find him blinded, perhaps, according to my observation, in the pessimistic condition into which he works himself on some of these great public questions.

Now, this is not a question of money. The American people do not deal with these problems from a financial standpoint. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois? That we shall do nothing here to-day upon this great public question. Now, I have said to this House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has said to this House, the Attorney-General of the United States has stated to the President, and every decision of our courts has sustained the opinion, that there is no power in the Executive to regulate or control the operation of this cable between California and Hawaii.

This corporation, the Commercial Cable Company, submitted to the President what it submitted here in writing. They asked him last December to sign a contract allowing them to lay this cable. He investigated the question, and you know that instead of acting upon it he submitted it to Congress and recommended the consideration of the subject.

Further, recognizing the fact that there is no power in our Executive to regulate that cable between the different portions of our domestic territory, the Attorney-General of the United States drew the bill which, slightly amended, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has offered here as a substitute, giving the President power to regulate properly this corporation that is seeking to obtain this public utility.

Now, I ask you, gentleman on this side, whether you will go it blind and give your countenance to a corporation exercising the methods that this corporation has exercised? First, it proposed by a cable message from London last August that they would build this cable under the conditions heretofore imposed upon the cable companies. I have Mr. Mackay's letter to the Secretary of State, duly certified, making that proposition. Then he came back and organized this company.

I know that he has boasted that he did not want Congress to act. He has had his representatives here for the last ninety days lobbying to prevent the consideration of the bill. They are now within the sound of my voice.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CORLISS. No; I prefer not. The gentleman extended the same courtesy to me.

Now, let me go on. The President found he had no authority to regulate this cable, no authority to consider the proposition, no right to regulate tolls, no right to regulate Government messages. He was absolutely without authority, and the Attorney-General prepared the bill in order to give him authority. Now, will you deny to the Executive of this country some power to act in connection with the corporation that is seeking to obtain this utility without authority and in violation, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] should remember, of the condition imposed upon every cable company that has ever laid a cable upon our shores?

John W. Mackay stands for the Commercial Pacific Cable Company and the Commercial Cable Company, and he is seeking to get this cable between California and Hawaii and thence round to China adopted without restrictions and in direct violation of the conditions that were imposed by President Grant upon the French cable which is now operated by Mr. Mackay, or rather by his ally, the Eastern Cable Company. What was that? President Grant found a French company seeking to lay a cable upon our shores in 1869, and it was in its infancy then.

There had been only one cable laid across the Atlantic, and that was by an act of Congress in 1867. President Grant found a cable company trying to land a cable upon our shores, and he investigated it and found that that cable company, the French company, had an exclusive grant from the French Government, giving them exclusive rights in France for a number of years.

What did President Grant do? Congress was not in session, and he took a battle ship and went out into the ocean and said, "You shall not land your cable upon these shores as long as you hold exclusive grants," and he succeeded in preventing them and finally compelled that company to go back to France, abrogate the exclusive franchises they had, and come here with their skirts clear, and then they laid the cable upon our shores, agreeing to maintain the conditions imposed by him, one of which was that they would not combine with any other company for the purpose of establishing tolls. Mr. Mackay, in his proposition, says that he will not combine except for the purpose of communicating through his ally in the Orient, which holds the monopoly.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend allow me right there?

Mr. CORLISS. Yes; if I have plenty of time.

Mr. CANNON. Has not the President now just as much authority to act as President Grant had then?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. HANBURY. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. CORLISS. Then I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HOPKINS. That can not be done now.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I think now that we ought to have a vote, and I ask for the regular order.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote upon the committee amendments.

Mr. HOPKINS. The other takes precedence.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I make the point of order that a vote upon the committee amendments is not in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out the enacting clause has precedence. While it is doubtful if the effect of the rule under which we are proceeding would not have precluded that motion, no objection was made, and it has been debated. Debate has been exhausted. The gentleman calls for a vote now upon the amendments. They have not been reached.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not in order to vote on the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that under the rules, which the committee can not change or consent to change, it is not in order to move to strike out the enacting clause until at least after the bill has been perfected.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Illinois had made that point of order in time, the Chair thinks, under this special order under which we are proceeding, it would have been well taken.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the rule was adopted by the House, if the Chair will permit me——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on his point of order.

Mr. MANN. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the rights have not been waived by failing to make the point of order when the motion was made, because the rule provides that all matters shall be considered under this rule relating to a Pacific cable, and I hold a motion to strike out the enacting clause, made at the beginning of the consideration of the bill in committee, does not abrogate the rule adopted by the House, which is a superior body to the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard a moment on that proposition.

In the first place, I contend that the Committee of the Whole having received the motion to strike out the enacting clause, and the point of order not being made against the motion at the time it was made, the Committee of the Whole has waived that proposition; but on the point of order that is made by the gentleman, even if he had made it against the motion to strike out the enacting clause as soon as the motion was offered, I contend that the special rule under which we are operating now does not apply.

I know that at the time of the consideration of the tariff bill in March, 1897, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] made a motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. At that time the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], being in the chair, held that the motion was not in order under the special rule of the House; but, Mr. Chairman, why was it not in order under the special rule at that time? Because that rule fixed the time for the consideration of amendments in Committee of the Whole. It said that the bill should be taken up under the five-minute rule on the 25th day of March, and consider it for amendment under the five-minute rule from the 25th day of March until 3 o'clock on the 31st day of March of that year, and that then the bill with all amendments that had been adopted by the committee should be reported back to the House; so that the House had specifically, in so many words, determined on what the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union should do in that instance, and the House had specifically determined how the committee should consider the amendments, the length of time it should consider them, and when it should report them back.

Therefore the House had instructed the Committee of the Whole what it should do, and it had no power to revoke the order of the House by striking out the enacting clause until the entire bill had been considered, because the House had said that the bill should be considered under the five-minute rule for a certain length of time. But this rule is not the same kind of a rule that we had in operation then. This rule merely provides that the bill shall be taken up, and, after being considered for four hours in general debate, shall be considered under the five-minute rule, and that any amendment relating to Pacific cables shall be in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I myself am satisfied that the point of order is not good, and I wish to withdraw it, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry, please. Is it in order to move to lay upon the table the motion to strike out the enacting clause?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. Without deciding the question as to whether, under the special rule under which we are proceeding, objection would have been in order if it had been made in time, the Chair is of opinion that the point of order not having been made, it is now too late to make it, just the same as in case of the rule forbidding legislation on an appropriation bill, if the point is not made when such an amendment is offered, or until after debate, it comes too late. The Chair therefore holds that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. MANN. I withdrew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the point of order was also made by the gentleman from Alabama. That is the reason of the Chair for making the ruling.

Mr. ADAMSON. Let us have a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], to strike out the enacting clause.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. ADAMSON demanded a division.

Pending the division,

Mr. CORLISS demanded tellers.

Mr. DALZELL and others. Let the Chair announce the vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The division was not completed.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the Chairman may announce the vote on the division.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the Chair will make the announcement.

Mr. CORLISS. I object. I want tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. ADAMSON and Mr. CORLISS.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 108, noes 71.

The announcement of the vote was received with applause.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back into the House with the action of the Committee of the Whole thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration under the special order the bill (H. R. 5) to authorize the construction, operation, and maintenance of telegraphic cables between the United States of America and Hawaii, Guam, and the Philippine Islands, and other countries, and to promote commerce, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. ADAMSON. On the motion that the House concur in the recommendation of the committee I ask for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on concurring in the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 116, nays 77, answered "present" 10, not voting 148, as follows:

DISPOSITION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9556) to amend an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws relating to the disposition of lands, etc.," approved March 3, 1901.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1901, entitled "An act to supplement existing laws relating to the disposition of lands," etc., be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of the proceeds of the sales of town lots in the towns of Lawton, Comanche County; Anadarko, Caddo County, and Hobart, Kiowa County, in the Territory of Oklahoma, heretofore had pursuant to the authority of the act aforesaid, to cause to be expended, subject to his control and supervision and upon the recommendation of the legally constituted authorities of each of said towns, for the construction of public waterworks, schoolhouses, and such other municipal improvements as may be advisable and advantageous to the inhabitants of said towns, the following additional sums, to wit: For the town of Lawton, $150,000; for the town of Anadarko, $60,000, and for the town of Hobart, $50,000: Provided further, That the sum of $10,000, as provided in the act whereof this is amendatory, for the construction of a county court-house in each of the towns aforesaid, shall be, and hereby is, increased to the sum of $30,000 each for the construction of such county court-houses in each town."

The following amendment was recommended by the Committee on the Public Lands:

In line 8, page 1, strike out the words "and directed."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma a question.

Mr. MADDOX. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand, this bill authorizes the expenditure of this fund in various municipalities?

Mr. FLYNN. Yes. When the Kiowa and Comanche country was opened, Congress provided that instead of opening up the town lots to the general rush, as was customary, they should be sold by auction to the highest bidder and the proceeds should go for the purpose of paying the county expenses, building bridges, roads, etc.

This bill provides, in view of the fact that the receipts from the sales were about four times as much as contemplated, and as every dollar was paid by the people living in these towns, that the purposes for which the money was received may be enlarged so that instead of building a court-house for $10,000 they may build one for $30,000, and, in addition to that, that they may use some of this fund to build schoolhouses in the city and to erect waterworks, etc. There will be no assessment upon property for about a year.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, there is nothing in the proposition or in the proposed amendment of the original law that in any way makes it necessary for an expenditure from the Treasury, in the event that these sales do not materialize?

Mr. FLYNN. Oh, no; the Government has nothing to do with it. This is our own money. It does not belong to the Government.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The sales have already been made?

Mr. FLYNN. Yes; the sales have been made.

Mr. CANNON. Have the lots been paid for?

Mr. FLYNN. They had to be paid for the day they were purchased.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the gentleman will allow me, let me say that the Secretary of the Interior has approved of the provisions in this bill, and it was reported unanimously by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. FLYNN. The Government has nothing to do with it. We only want to enlarge the scope of this fund by reason of the enormous receipts. Let me say to my friend from Indiana who had the honor to be our first governor—and, by the way, he was a good one—that these three towns, instead of being open to the rush and everybody get what they could, we changed it so that the people got their lots by auction and they paid for them, and the receipts from the sales of those lots were to be expended for their own county improvement at home. If we had opened it up to the general rush, the lots would have been taken by anybody, and nobody would have received any money; but the sales from these three towns amounted to about $750,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I see that the gentleman has named in the bill a definite sum for each town. Is that in accordance with the gross amount received for the lots of that town?

Mr. FLYNN. I aimed to make it about one-third of the gross receipts in each one of the towns.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has it been done so that it will be distributed fairly?

Mr. FLYNN. Yes; that was the object we had in this bill. It was made to give the towns about one-third of the money they put in, and it is for waterworks and schoolhouses, etc.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will ask the gentleman a question. Is it satisfactory to the citizens of the various towns?

Mr. FLYNN. O Lord, yes. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman how much does this bill get away with?

Mr. FLYNN. We will spend it all in time.

Mr. PAYNE. I mean this bill.

Mr. FLYNN. That would be a hard question to answer.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman does not like to answer it, very well.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not contemplated to build bridges?

Mr. FLYNN. That is in the original act.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand that; but will not the money we are now appropriating be available for building bridges?

Mr. FLYNN. Money is already available for that purpose. The question now is in regard to the construction of court-houses. The original act provided that we should build court-houses to cost not exceeding $10,000. But the receipts have been so large that those people insist that they should have better court-houses. This bill authorizes the erection of court-houses to cost as much as $30,000 each, and waterworks and such other municipal improvements as the municipal authorities and the Secretary of the Interior may agree upon.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the committee was read.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. FLYNN. I ask that the report on this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report (by Mr. FLYNN) is as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4556) entitled "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to supplement existing laws relating to the disposition of lands, etc.' approved March 3, 1901," have considered the bill and recommend that it be passed with an amendment striking out the words "and directed," in line 8, page 1.

In the "Act to supplement existing laws relating to the disposition of lands, etc.," approved March 3, 1901, provision was made for the sale of town lots in the three county seats of the counties organized out of the Kiowa, Comanche and Apache, and Wichita and Caddo reservations in Oklahoma which were opened for settlement in August last, and provision was also made for the erection in each of the county-seat towns of a court-house at a cost not to exceed $10,000 each, to be paid for out of the proceeds of the sale of town lots. The residue was to be applied to the construction of bridges, roads, and other improvements in the county. Thanks to the efficient, honest, and capable manner in which the Secretary of the Interior disposed of the town lots, the proceeds from the sales far exceeded the most sanguine expectations of all parties, the net receipts being as follows:

Lawton	$412,355.38
Anadarko	186,910.47
Hobart	130,936.00
Total	730,201.85

The object of this bill is to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to expend certain sums for the construction of public waterworks, schoolhouses, and other municipal improvements in the county seats, and to increase the amount available under the present law for the erection of a county court-house in each of said towns. This money does not belong to the United States, but is held by the Secretary of the Interior in trust for the counties to which it belongs. The bill will not take one cent from the United States Treasury. It merely directs the Secretary of the Interior to use a certain part of the people's money now in his hands for purposes other than those authorized by existing laws.

The committee referred the bill to the Secretary of the Interior for a report, and his views concerning the same are herewith attached.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 8, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st ultimo, submitting, for such suggestions or information as may be deemed proper to aid the committee in its consideration, a copy of H. R. 4556, entitled "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to supplement existing laws relating to the disposition of lands, etc.,' approved March 3, 1901."

In response thereto I inclose copy of a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office dated the 27th ultimo, recommending the passage of the bill if amended by striking out the words "and directed," in line 8, after the word "authorized."

I concur in the recommendation that the bill be passed if amended as suggested.

Very respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK,
Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE PUBLIC LANDS,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 27, 1902.

SIR: I am in receipt, by departmental reference, for report in duplicate and return of papers, of House bill 4556, amending act of March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. L., 1093), and providing:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of the proceeds of the sales of town lots in town of Lawton, Comanche County; Anadarko, Caddo County, and Hobart, Kiowa County, in the Territory of Oklahoma, heretofore had pursuant to the authority of the act aforesaid, to cause to be expended, subject to his control and supervision and upon recommendation of the legally constituted authorities of each of said towns, for the construction of public waterworks, schoolhouses, and such other municipal improvements as may be advisable and advantageous to the inhabitants of said towns, the following additional sums, to wit: For the town of Lawton, $150,000; for the town of Anadarko, $80,000, and for the town of Hobart, $50,000: Provided further, That the sum of $10,000, as provided in the act whereof this is amendatory, for the construction of a county court-house in each of the towns aforesaid, shall be, and hereby is, increased to the sum of $30,000 each for the construction of such county court-houses in each town."

The act of March 3, 1901, provides inter alia:

"The receipts from the sale of these lots in the respective county seats shall, after deducting the expenses incident to the surveying, subdividing, plotting, and selling of the same, be disposed of under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the following manner: A court-house shall be erected therewith at such county seat at a cost of not exceeding $10,000, and the residue shall be applied to the construction of bridges, roads, and such other public improvements as the Secretary of the Interior shall deem appropriate, including the payment of all expenses actually necessary to the maintenance of the county government until the time for collecting county taxes in the calendar year next succeeding the time of the opening. No indebtedness of any character shall be contracted or incurred by any of said counties prior to the time for collecting county taxes in the calendar year next succeeding the opening, excepting where the same shall have been authorized by the Secretary of the Interior."

The purpose of the amendatory act is to authorize the expenditure of a portion of the funds derived from the sales of lots at the several county seats for the benefit of those towns and to increase the amount available under existing law for the construction of county court-houses.

The act of March 3, 1901, contemplated that the funds derived from the sale of these lots should be devoted to what might be termed "county public improvements" and to the maintenance of the several county governments until that could be provided for by the collection of county taxes. The sum actually derived from said sales at each county seat, exclusive of all expense incident thereto, was far in excess of what could reasonably have been expected or is needed for the purpose contemplated in the act, and it is but equitable that those who contributed, by the purchase of lots, should derive in some measure the accruing benefit, especially as the proposed expenditure will correspondingly be to the interest of the counties in that their revenues will for a time be principally derived from the taxable property of the towns.

I see no objection to devoting the sums named to the construction of public waterworks, schoolhouses, and such other municipal improvements as may be advisable or to increasing the amount available for the construction of court-houses, and I recommend the enactment of such a law.

The only objection I perceive to the bill under consideration is that it is obligatory upon the Secretary of the Interior to make such expenditures as may be recommended, within the amounts specified in the bill, retaining only control and supervision over the disbursements, without express authority to limit the amount of expenditure for any particular purpose.

The bill, in my judgment, should be amended by striking out the words "and directed" in line 8, after the word "authorized," and if so amended I recommend its passage.

Very respectfully,

BINGER HERMANN,
Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

HENRY BIEDERBICK AND OTHERS.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 2921) to place Henry Biederbick, Julius R. Frederick, Francis Long, and Maurice Connell on the retired list of enlisted men of the Army.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause Henry Biederbick, Julius R. Frederick, Francis Long, and Maurice Connell, survivors of the Lady Franklin Bay expedition, to be enlisted as first-class sergeants of the Signal Corps of the Army and to place them on the retired list of the Army, with the pay and allowances, from and after the passage of this act, of first-class sergeants of the Signal Corps who have been retired after continuous active service of fifteen years.

Mr. MADDOX. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] will explain.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, this measure has been a number of times passed by the Senate and has been several times favorably reported by the House Committee on Military Affairs. There are now remaining but five survivors of the famous Greely expedition to the North. These five survivors are General Greely, now the Chief of the Signal Corps, and the four men named in this bill. These men imperiled their lives in the pursuit of science. For many months they endured the hardships of the frozen North in a manner which has brought praise from the lips of all who have read any account of that expedition. Admiral Schley rescued these men in his expedition which was sent for that purpose, and known as the Lady Franklin Bay relief expedition.

The object of this bill is simply to give to these men the only recognition which remains for a grateful nation to bestow upon those who have imperiled their lives in war or the pursuit of science. All four of these men saw long and creditable service as privates in the United States Army, and every one of them has been broken in health. The bill merely gives them the rank and pay of first-class sergeants of the Signal Corps. It has been strongly urged by General Greely, who was the chief of that expedition, and who has himself been recognized on account of that service by promotions in official position. The bill has been unanimously reported, and, as I have said, has the unqualified indorsement of all who have given it attention.

Mr. MADDOX. These people whom you propose now to put on the pension list, were they civilians or were they enlisted men?

Mr. OVERSTREET. They were enlisted men in the United States Army. They have served terms of nine, twelve, and fifteen years each, and have been retired on account of disability.

Mr. MADDOX. Are they not already drawing pensions?

Mr. OVERSTREET. They are drawing pensions, I think, not exceeding $30. This bill will make a small increase; I do not know the limit, but the amount is small. The rank and recognition are the main objects of the measure.

Mr. MADDOX. What is the real purpose of the bill?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The purpose is to give the only recognition that Congress can give to a band of men who endangered their lives in the pursuit of science. This expedition carried the American flag to the northernmost point it has ever been planted by any scientific expedition. The bill is simply a recognition of their services. It does not carry any money. It authorizes the President to retire them with the rank and pay of first-class sergeants of the Signal Corps. They were privates in the United States Army.

Mr. MADDOX. It does not give them any additional pay?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It retires them with whatever pay their rank may entitle them to—about $40 or $50 a month, according to my understanding.

Mr. MADDOX. Does it give them back pay, too?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, no; not at all. I will say to the gentleman that, under the law, whatever pension they may now be receiving will, as I am informed, be annulled in the event of this rank being bestowed upon them. I hope the gentleman will not object. The bill is entirely meritorious.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JAMES W. LONG.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 282) providing for the appointment of James W. Long, late a captain, United States Army, a captain of infantry, and for placing his name on the retired list, for present consideration.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill just read for present consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDOX. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CULBERSON, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a full, itemized statement of all moneys collected and disbursed by the authorities of the United States in Cuba from the military occupation thereof until May 20, 1902.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I asked that this resolution might lie over until to-day. I desire now to make a statement with reference to the information called for, and if the Senate wants to pass the resolution I have no objection.

The Committee on Relations with Cuba were directed by a resolution passed by the Senate to ascertain and furnish the information which is called for by this resolution from the time when we took possession of Cuba on the 1st of January, 1899, to the 30th of April, 1900, a period of one year and four months. The committee discharged that duty and reported to the Senate an itemized account, furnished by the War Department, of all receipts and expenditures during that time, a period of a year and four months, and the volumes in which those accounts are contained are on my desk. Senators will see that there are five volumes.

Mr. GALLINGER. How many pages?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not know the number of pages. I do not know that the volumes are paged. This is one of them. [Exhibiting.] They are all of the same character.

So the information asked for has been furnished from the 1st of January, 1899, when the Spanish evacuated, up to the 30th of April, 1900. Of course, that information does not need to be furnished over again by the Secretary of War.

I wish further to state that after we turned over the government to the people of Cuba under its constitution on the 20th of May, the Secretary of war thought he ought to complete a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Government and military occupation in Cuba, commencing where this leaves off, on the 30th of April, 1900, and extending to the present time, a period practically of two years—a trifle over. He has already commenced that work. To do so it required the employment of 15 typewriters and the renting of 15 unusual typewriting machines, as there were no machines in the War Department which were adapted to that kind of work.

It is questionable whether there is any direct authority for the employment of the new force which is required to complete this work or whether there is authority for the payment of it out of the fund for the payment of temporary employees in the War Department, a balance of which still remains, but the Secretary took the responsibility of starting the work and employing these typewriters, as he could not do it by his ordinary force. They are at work, and some two months, May and June, of 1900 have already been prepared.

I am told that this force of 15 typewriters working thus can probably, when they get thoroughly down to the work, prepare a month's statement of the receipts and expenditures in a week's time. As it will require something like a week to tabulate the information required for a month, and as two months have already been done and twenty-two months remain, it will take the force which has been employed still about twenty-two weeks to prepare this information, which, as I said, the Secretary of War has of his own motion thought he ought to prepare and send to Congress. How the expense of this is to be met is still a problem. I suppose the Secretary will ask for an item to be inserted in the deficiency appropriation bill to enable him to pay the force which is necessary to do this work.

Now, if under the circumstances the Senate desires to pass this resolution, I have no objection whatever.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the sole purpose of the resolution was to have presented to the Senate the information to which it refers. Before the Senator from Connecticut took the floor this morning, my attention was called to a letter of the Secretary of War, which appears in the RECORD of June 6, in the proceedings of the House of Representatives, the letter being dated May 31, and addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, in which the Secretary states that it is his purpose to present to Congress, as soon as it is practicable to make it, an itemized statement of all moneys received and disbursed from the 30th of April, 1900, down to and including the 20th of May of this year, and that a large force of clerks was then at work.

Under the circumstances, and not doubting, of course, that the Secretary will present this information as soon as it is possible for him to have the statements prepared, I have no disposition to press the resolution. It may lie on the table subject to call, so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the resolution lying on the table?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If I can be here when it is called up, I do not object.

Mr. ALDRICH. It had better go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to its going to the Calendar?

Mr. CULBERSON. Let it go to the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. I request the Senator from Texas to withdraw the resolution, as I am sure this information is absolutely essential to closing up our affairs in Cuba. We have already secured five volumes of the detailed work of expenditures there, and we should have the account of expenditures completed. I have no doubt that in the deficiency appropriation bill there will be provision made for the payment of the necessary force to complete this work, probably adding seven or eight volumes more to the information we have now.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if it is his understanding that it is the intention of the War Department to make a full report showing all the revenues collected by the Government of the United States or by its agencies while it has been in possession of affairs in Cuba and also an account of all disbursements?

Mr. ALLISON. That is the purpose.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Showing the source from which revenues were received and where all the money has gone?

Mr. ALLISON. The revenues received and their disbursement—a continuation of what is already partially done.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think that ought to be done. I believe there ought to be a full statement made. I think the Government of the United States owes it to its own self, to its self-respect, and to the opinion of mankind that there should be a full account had of all the money collected in the island of Cuba and what has been done with every dollar of it.

Mr. ALLISON. That will be done, I am sure, from various sources. I hope the Senator from Texas will withdraw the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition shall be made of the resolution?

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggested that the resolution go to the Calendar.

Mr. SPOONER. I move its reference to the Committee——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let it go to the Calendar.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the resolution going to the Calendar? The Chair hears none. It will go to the Calendar.

DECORATION BY THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 6136) to authorize Mr. H. H. D. Peirce, Third Assistant Secretary of State, to accept a decoration conferred upon him by the Government of the French Republic. There will be no objection to it, I think. There are some special reasons why it should be passed to-day, if it can be done.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I was going to state that I will put on file two letters, one from the Secretary of State and the other from Ambassador Cambon, showing the reason why the decoration of Commander of Legion of Honor is conferred upon the Third Assistant Secretary of State. That is all there is to the bill. It simply confers the decoration named on Third Assistant Secretary Peirce, and the explanation is given in the two letters, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 5, 1902.

Hon. SHELBY M. CULLOM,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations.

SIR: I have the honor to ask that in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the act approved January 31, 1881, permission may be obtained from Congress for the below-mentioned gentlemen to accept certain decorations recently conferred upon them by the Government of the French Republic, and that this Department may be authorized to deliver the same to them.

These decorations are: Commander of the Legion of Honor, conferred upon Mr. H. H. D. Peirce, Third Assistant Secretary of State; Officer of the Legion of Honor, conferred upon Col. Theodore A. Bingham, United States Army; and Officer of the Legion of Honor, conferred upon Capt. R. P. Rodgers, United States Navy.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN HAY.

EMBASSY OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC IN THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, May 23, 1902.

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: The minister for foreign affairs at Paris has just sent me, and it gives me pleasure to transmit to you herewith in addition to the letter advising him of his nomination, the insignia of Commander of the Legion of Honor, conferred upon Mr. Herbert H. D. Peirce, Assistant Secretary of State of the United States at Washington.

The diploma will be sent later to Mr. Peirce.

Please accept, Mr. Secretary of State, the assurances of my high consideration.

JULES CAMBON.

Hon. JOHN HAY,
Secretary of State of the United States, Washington, D. C.

[Translation.]

PARIS, May 10, 1902.

MR. ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE: It is my agreeable duty to inform you that the President of the Republic, wishing to bestow on you a special mark of his high regard, has conferred upon you, at my suggestion, the cross of commander of the National Order of the Legion of Honor.

I congratulate myself at having been able to enumerate the titles which you possess to this mark of distinction, and I hasten to transmit to you the insignia of the order.

I shall have pleasure in forwarding your diploma later.

Accept, Mr. Assistant Secretary of State, the assurances of my high consideration.

DELCASSE.

MR. HERBERT H. D. PEIRCE,
Under Secretary of State, Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the United States of America.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I thought we were going to have some explanation of this matter.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator is very anxious about it I hope the letters will be read. Mr. Peirce is Third Assistant Secretary of State and had charge, practically, of the gentlemen from France who came here to attend the unveiling of the statue of Rochambeau. He did a good deal of work and gave great attention to those gentlemen, and the result of it was that the ambassador asked that this title be conferred upon him. That is all there is of the case.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. He was not alone in the attention which was shown to the distinguished French visitors who came here.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, there is so much confusion in the Chamber we are unable on this side to hear what it is that is before the Senate. What is under discussion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill authorizing the Third Assistant Secretary of State to accept the decoration of Commander of the Legion of Honor.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was a unanimous-consent agreement day before yesterday or yesterday that to-day, after the morning hour, should be devoted to certain special business, and I do not think there ought to be any violation of these unanimous-consent agreements.

Mr. SPOONER. On what account is the decoration to be conferred?

Mr. CULLOM. On account of his attention to the party of French gentlemen who were here by invitation of the Government to attend the unveiling of the statue of Rochambeau.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the Senator asking unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, I am.

Mr. SPOONER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to say one word before the subject passes away.

Mr. SPOONER. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. HOAR. This is a mere method of the French Government by which it wishes to express its sense of our courtesy. It selects one of our prominent public officials as a means of making a bow and saying, "I am much obliged to you." It is merely a compliment, and it is but reasonable that the French Republic should be allowed in proper limits to make their own selection and do it in the way they think best. The French Government has received what it regards as a great honor to their people in the statues of Lafayette and Rochambeau and wishes to mark in some courteous fashion its sense of the honor. So it selects one of the representatives of this Government who accompanied its representatives about on their visit here and sends this token. It is nothing but a ribbon to stick in his coat, and I suppose it will not stay there a great while.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. SPOONER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill goes to the Calendar. The Chair lays before the Senate Senate bill 1792.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I regret that I have been detained from the Senate by illness in my family for the last two days. Yesterday when the motion was before the Senate looking to the discharge of the Committee on Privileges and Elections from the further consideration of the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the election of Senators, my pair, the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], holding to the same view that I do, voted in favor of discharging the committee, and unfortunately I was deprived of a pair. Had I been here I should have voted with the minority in favor of discharging the committee.

I have the very highest regard, of course, for every member of that committee, especially and particularly for the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], but I am of the opinion that when any committee, however distinguished, reaches a point where it confessedly is unable to report either favorably or unfavorably on a proposition the committee ought to be discharged. Therefore, for that reason, had I been here I should have voted to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the joint resolution.

LONDON DOCK CHARGES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1792) to amend an act entitled "An act relating to navigation of vessels, bills of lading, and to certain obligations, duties, and rights in connection with the carriage of property."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] offered an amendment for the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. The proposed amendment will be read to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following as section 2:

SEC. 2. That this act shall not in any way apply to foreign port charges, lighterage, expense of discharging, or other charges which it is agreed in a written charter party of the whole ship shall be paid by the charterer, consignee, or owner of the goods.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say about that amendment that it is utterly destructive of the bill. If such an amendment is adopted it destroys the bill altogether, and it ought to be voted down.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the amendment be read again.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. When this matter was last before the Senate I think the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] was addressing the Senate when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived. I did not wish to interrupt him in his remarks, but I would be glad if he or the Senator from Minnesota, who has charge of the bill, would give the specific point, and crystallize, as it were, what is intended to be done by the bill. There is a great deal of literature on this subject, and it is confusing. As I have been able to gather it, it is about this: That by the custom of London there are certain charges which have to be paid after goods are landed on the docks—I may be mistaken, but that is as near as I can get at it—and there is a contention as to who shall pay those charges.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Certain charges which have to be paid upon cargoes from North Atlantic ports and from none others in the world.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That includes Canada as well as the United States?

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that I saw a manifest the other day which was from an entirely different part of the world than North Atlantic ports, where this contract was stamped on the face of it.

Mr. SPOONER. But I have the statement of the Senator from Minnesota and Mr. Choate's report.

Mr. GALLINGER. I saw the document.

Mr. HALE. I will state——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. HALE. I beg pardon.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I stated the other day in debate that the proposition coming from the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that this method of laying dock charges only applies to goods on vessels from North American ports and was a discrimination against them, is not, as I understand it, a correct statement. I do not mean that the Senator intended to give us an incorrect statement; but we find on investigation that other countries use this clause, and that it is used to a large extent elsewhere.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the Senator has ascertained that since our colloquy the other day?

Mr. HALE. No; I stated the other day one thing I knew then, that the great Oriental and Peninsular Company, one of the largest in the world, uses just such a clause as this from all parts of the world.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me a moment on this point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator, but I desire to correct the statement of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and to reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Connecticut, but I will not interrupt the Senator if it be objectionable to him.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have not finished my inquiry, and it will only take me a moment to do so.

Mr. NELSON. All right.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I want to know what we are asked to vote for. It is very difficult to ascertain from these reports and from the statements which have been made heretofore; and I want to know whether this is it: That by the custom of London, goods to that port which go over the side of the ship are subjected to some charges which have to be paid by some one? If that be so, then the question is, Who should pay those charges? I had supposed that when goods were delivered that, of course, would naturally terminate the liability of the common carrier; but if by the custom of London the common carrier has to pay these charges, I do not see any reason why he should not incorporate that clause in his bill of lading. I do not know that I get at this exactly. I should like to be informed about it.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is misinformed upon that point. This bill does not relate to any charges that the steamship companies are required to pay to any dock company. It is merely a charge which they themselves impose for discharging goods from the vessel. By the custom, by the common law, and by the act of Parliament, goods shipped in vessels to the port of London are entitled to free delivery, and the dock companies by their bill of lading, which they have imposed on shipments from North Atlantic ports, have incorporated a clause, which they call the London clause, requiring shippers to pay on their goods, in addition to all other charges, a certain charge to the steamship companies for discharging their cargoes.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information in that connection.

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. As a matter of fact, when this clause is in these freight bills, when a ship goes to London and discharges its goods from the ship to a lighter, are these charges made or not?

Mr. NELSON. On the dock?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. No; if the goods are discharged onto a lighter, are the charges made or not?

Mr. NELSON. No, they can not charge then; they have no right to charge; but they can under this London dock clause.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is the question I was asking.

Mr. NELSON. By the common law prevailing in England and by the act of Parliament shippers are entitled to the free discharge of any goods on the dock.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not think I quite understand the Senator's answer. My question is, if, as a matter of fact, when a steamship has one of those bills of lading with this clause in it, when it arrives at the port of London, are these charges made when it discharges goods to lighters and not on the dock?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly, the charges are made in both cases. The bill of lading which contains this London clause that we are trying to get rid of, provides for just such charges, and the English courts hold that, while by the common law of England and the act of Parliament the shippers are entitled to free delivery and the companies have no right to make this charge, yet inasmuch as the shippers have accepted bills of lading containing permission to make that charge, it neutralizes the law and takes them out of the protection of the law.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] are misinformed as to another point, and that is that the bills of lading of other steamship lines contain this clause.

Mr. HALE. They contain a similar clause, but of course it is not called the London-dock clause, because that only applies there. They contain, however, the same kind of provision, and the same charges that are made to shippers at London are made by different companies in other quarters of the globe, not only where they go to London, but where they go to Glasgow, Manchester, Bristol, and several other English ports.

Mr. NELSON. There is nothing of the kind in any bill of lading to show it, and the report of Mr. Choate entirely neutralizes that.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Minnesota is wrong about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, Mr. President, I will send him a bill of lading for his examination.

Mr. NELSON. I have got that bill of lading published in Mr. Choate's report. The bill of lading which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] sends me is printed in French, and I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I am unable to read it, but the bill of this same steamship company he will find in Mr. Cheate's report, on page 44.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, this notice stamped on the face of the bill of lading is not in French:

> The expense of discharging from the steamer and manipulating to be borne by the goods at the rate of 3 shillings 6 pence per 1,000 kilos.

Mr. NELSON. That is not in the port of London, and that is not correct as to that port.

Mr. SPOONER. To what port does that apply?

Mr. GALLINGER. The port of London.

Mr. NELSON. Here is Mr. Choate's report, and I will read from it:

> These charges of the "London clause" are a pure discrimination against the American trade, and do not apply to any other trade in the port of London.
> This charge of 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. is one which penalizes American goods, as it is not applied in the port of London to goods arriving from any other market; in other words, flour from Russia, the Cape, Australia, or in fact any other market except North America, does not pay this charge, and to that extent American goods of all descriptions (for flour is only one of these) are penalized by this charge.

Mr. Choate states further:

> There is undoubtedly a discrimination as against flour from the United States and Canada in favor of flour coming to London from all other parts of the world. Flour is brought to London from many other parts of the world and is landed and delivered from large steamers in much the same way, and whatever cost attaches to this mode of delivery is paid by the shipowners out of the freight, no such clause as the "London clause" having been adopted.
>
> Canadian and American flour is by far the largest import of flour into London, and although other imported flour, such as Hungarian, French, Russian, Australian, Californian, gets free overside delivery, Canadian and American flour is subjected to the "London clause," and besides which, whereas the charge for landing at an uptown warehouse for the purpose of distribution in Canadian and American is 4s. per ton, the charge on other imported flour is 3s. 6d. per ton, so that Canadian and American costs 2s. per ton more to land than other flour.

Mr. HALE. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. NELSON. I am reading from page 9 of the report of the committee on this bill.

Mr. HALE. Who made the report?

Mr. NELSON. I have read a few lines from the report of the committee itself, and the rest is quoted; the first part from hearings before the committee, and the last two paragraphs from the report of Mr. Choate.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator read this from Mr. Choate's report:

> The ultimate question must be whether the "dock charges" imposed by the "London clause" are really unjust to the shippers, and on that question an acquiescence of twelve years by the shippers without forcing it upon the attention of the Government has a decided bearing.

I did not hear the Senator read that.

Mr. NELSON. I did not read the whole of it.

Mr. HALE. No; I thought not.

Mr. NELSON. I read a portion of it. That portion which says that there has been an acquiescence in these charges by the shippers is not true. They have been trying for twelve years by negotiation to get rid of these charges.

Mr. HALE. I do not want the Senator to discredit his own witness. He brought Mr. Choate in here.

Mr. NELSON. I am not discrediting him.

Mr. HALE. The Senator says his statement is not correct.

Mr. NELSON. That statement is not correct.

Mr. HALE. That is Mr. Choate's statement.

Mr. NELSON. It is not correct to the extent that the shippers have consented silently to these charges. If Mr. Choate means that they have not applied to Congress before, that is true; but the record shows that they have repeatedly made efforts by negotiation to have the shipowners and the ship combines eliminate these charges.

I have a table here, which was furnished to the committee, from the year 1887 down to 1899, showing the goods imported into the port of London by steamship companies, and out of the total imports into the port of London by steamship companies over 75 per cent of the goods entering that port by water are exempt from this charge, and only the small amount of 25 per cent which comes from America are subjected to this charge. I am sorry that I have taken up the time of the Senator from Connecticut, and I yield to him.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, it is always very difficult to understand a technical question relating to trade conditions, and I do not think we ought to jump at conclusions here because some millers and lumbermen, who, I understand, are the only people who are pressing this legislation——

Mr. NELSON. Oh, that is not so.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Who else is pressing it?

Mr. NELSON. The farmers of the Northwest, the wheat and corn producers, and others.

Mr. SPOONER. If they are discriminated against, why should they not press it? Their products constitute a very large part of the export trade of the United States, and if these shippers of flour in the United States are subjected to these charges in London which shippers of flour in other countries are not subjected to in London, why should our people not object to them?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The point I was making was that I have not been able—my reading of this literature has been somewhat hasty—to see that anyone else was complaining.

Mr. ALLISON. I have here a copy of the report, which shows that the flour and the lumber people do not stand alone in their request for this legislation; but we have resolutions of the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce, of the Toledo Produce Exchange, of the Chicago Board of Trade, of the Kansas City Board of Trade, of the St. Paul Merchants' Exchange, of the Baltimore Chamber of Commerce, and other commercial bodies. I do not know what bearing that may have, but I should think that some of our own people were interested in this legislation from the character of the bodies who have adopted these resolutions.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. They come very near to being from the flour and lumber men, as I understand from listening to what has been referred to by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. Certainly in reading some of these reports, either of the majority or of the minority, I have seen in them somewhere the statement that the trades particularly interested were the milling and the lumber trades.

I had in mind a sentence half completed proceeding upon that theory when I was interrupted—I do not know whether or not I can recall it now—but I think I was going to say that if these milling and lumber interests were the only ones who were interested in this legislation I thought we ought to be very careful about passing legislation as to matters we really do not know anything about. This is all confusion.

I venture to say there are not three Senators on this floor who understand the matter fully. I myself hesitate about voting in favor of legislation interfering with contracts between shippers and common carriers. That is a matter of contract just as much as any other trade matter is a matter of contract. It seems to me that we ought to be a little careful about legislating here as to how trades should be made and carried on in the United States. That is all there is about this thing so far as I can see, that as to the matter of shipments of flour and lumber we are going to interfere and say what the contracts shall be between the millers and the lumbermen and the shipowners and freighters. It seems to me that is a matter which we can leave to the adjustment of contractual relations just as much as we can leave to such adjustment questions relating to the purchase and sale of goods in the United States. What would be thought if we should be asked here to say that anybody who had anything to sell in the market should only sell it on certain terms and conditions? That is just what we are asked to do here in this matter.

These people are engaged in freighting. We say that they shall not make their own bargains for the freight, but they shall take their freight subject to certain trade stipulations. I think we ought to be a little careful about this, Mr. President. It is commencing a matter of legislation in which we may go very far. To go from the sublime to the ridiculous, we do not know how soon we may be called upon to pass legislation that no man who has a horse to sell shall sell it without a warranty in writing, which would be just as much a subject of national legislation as is this, in my judgment.

Now, I come back to my original proposition, which has not been entirely explained. Something has to be paid for the dock charges or the distribution of goods after they go over the side of the ship in London, as I understand it. I have always supposed that a shipper discharged his obligation when he passed the goods over the side of the ship. If for any reason he is called upon to assume the payment of those charges it seems to me that it is entirely reasonable that he should include them in his freight contract; but if he does not include it in his freight contract, then, as was suggested by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], he would certainly charge more for the freight.

I think we ought to be a little careful about taking up the contentions between shippers and freighters, between people who have things to sell and people who want to buy, and making such things the subject of national legislation. I think I have said all I desire to say about this matter. With my understanding of it, I shall be opposed to this legislation.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, the ordinary rule of commercial law holds the shipowner responsible for the cargo and for all expenses incident to the transportation of the cargo until its delivery. Under that rule, without this London dock clause in the bill of lading the shipowner would not be able to collect from the miller or from the miller's consignee in London this 1s. 9d. per ton charge which is now collected under that London dock clause.

There is a contract, of course. The bill of lading is a contract as well as a piece of evidence, but so far as I have been able to observe as a member of the Committee on Commerce, which has given this subject some investigation, I am inclined to think that the miller of the Northwest is not entirely a free agent on such a contract.

Mr. SPOONER. Not what?

Mr. MALLORY. Not a free agent; that is, he is not at liberty. He is bound, as it were, by the conditions to sign that bill of lading, because if he does not accept the bill of lading with the London dock clause in it his goods will not be shipped. In other words, he is under a species of duress.

It does not do to say that we are interfering with the liberty of contract when we prohibit the insertion of such a clause in a bill of lading, because in reality, under my view and understanding, gathered from the evidence, it is a restoration to the shipper of the freedom which he ought to have to agree to such stipulations as the shipowner chooses to prescribe. These are through bills of lading, as I understand, from Milwaukee or Minneapolis or St. Paul to London, and the goods are shipped from the mill direct through. If that bill of lading is not accepted by the miller it is a question, when those goods get to the eastern terminus of the railroad here, as to when they will be shipped by sea to London.

Mr. President, that being so, while the general rule of law is that the shipowners are responsible not merely for the safe delivery of the cargo, but also for all expenses incident to that safe delivery until the cargo itself is delivered, this London dock clause is an exception to the rule; and unless there is some good reason why that exception should be maintained, it strikes me that Congress is justified in destroying that exception to the rule.

It is contended on the part of the shipowners that this rule is really for the benefit of the miller; that without such a rule as that he would be compelled to pay 4 shillings per ton to the dock owners in London while his goods are being held in storage on the dock after the expiration of twenty-four hours; and when we have such large shipments as we are shipping nowadays in our immense freighters, of 75,000 or 100,000 sacks of flour, it is impossible within twenty-four hours for the consignee to remove them.

Consequently the shipowner says that these 9 shillings and 6 pence which he charges for the keeping of these goods on the dock under shelter for seventy-two hours, is really a benefit to the shipper, because without it the shipper would, after the expiration of twenty-four hours, have to pay 4 shillings instead of 1 shilling and 9 pence. The shipper of the goods, however, says—I do not know what his reason for it is—that he does not agree to that; that he does not see where the benefit comes in; and he insists upon his right that he should be placed upon the same footing as every other shipper from the United States.

Mr. President, I do not think there is any question whatever but that this peculiar practice which prevails in our trade with London is an exception to the general rule and is a distinction adverse to our flour trade—and I will confine it, if necessary, to the flour trade, although it is not necessary to confine it to the flour trade—which is a very large part of our trade with England.

In his report to the Secretary of State upon this subject, Ambassador Choate says distinctly and unequivocally that—

> There is undoubtedly a discrimination as against flour from the United States and Canada in favor of flour coming to London from all other parts of the world. Flour is brought to London from many other parts of the world and is landed and delivered from large steamers in much the same way, and whatever cost attaches to this mode of delivery is paid by the shipowners out of the freight, no such clause as the "London clause" having been adopted.

So far as I could gather from the testimony of the witnesses before the committee, this is a rule which prevails in London alone, and does not apply to Liverpool and other ports in Great Britain.

Mr. President, this rule is working very much to the discomfort and disadvantage of the millers, if we are to accept what they say. On the other hand, the shipowners say it works very much to the advantage of the millers. In fact, however, if the rule is abrogated, if this London clause is prohibited, then it seems that the effect of it will be to decrease the charges which the shipper has to pay on his goods from the interior of the United States to London. The other effect upon the shipper and the shipping interest would be that the freight—because it would be charged as freight and paid between our Eastern Atlantic ports or our North Atlantic ports and London—would necessarily go up, and the port of Liverpool and other ports in England would have an advantage over the port of London.

I think that is really the principal reason why there is so much contest over this very reasonable request on the part of the shippers. I do not know that they are going to reap any very great benefit from it, but I think that their demand is a reasonable one. It is in conformity with existing law, and it is in the direction of doing away with a distinction against a particular trade and a particular part of the trade of the United States. Therefore, I think we ought to support the measure.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, there are several things claimed by the advocates of this bill upon which there is undoubtedly contention. The matter has been considered in the other branch of Congress and a report has been made there by a committee—in fact, two reports. There is a very able report of the minority of the committee having the subject in charge against this whole matter, and nothing has been done following it, because largely of the confusion which exists in men's minds. Pretty much every statement that is made here is countervailed by another statement. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] reads with much satisfaction from our ambassador, Mr. Choate, but when I called his attention to the one distinctive thing in Mr. Choate's report, in which he says that—> must be whether the "dock charges" imposed by the "London clause" are really unjust to the shippers, and on that question an acquiescence of twelve years by the shippers without forcing it upon the attention of the Government has a decided bearing.

> The ultimate question—

Upon that the Senator from Minnesota discredits his own witness, and says that Mr. Choate is wrong. At the present moment, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] says, I do not believe there are a half dozen Senators here—or three Senators—who really know or understand the scope of the bill. It does not commend itself to anybody on reading it. It is an attempt ruthlessly to put the hand of the Government in and declare that, as between two persons competent to make a trade, such and such a provision shall not be law, although put in the contract. That does not commend itself to any Senator.

There is nothing left but the cry of discrimination; that the United States are discriminated against; that North America is discriminated against, and that that ought not to be. That has been said; and if time permitted we could show repeated cases, one which has been given in terms by the Senator——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call his attention and that of the Senator from New Hampshire to a curiosity in connection with this matter.

Mr. HALE. I do not want the Senator now, in what I am saying, to bring in any new matter.

Mr. NELSON. It is not any new matter, but is responsive to this particular point.

Mr. HALE. Go on.

Mr. NELSON. It is the fact that when Mr. Choate in his report stated that this did not apply to any other trade or commerce and was not used by any other steamship lines, it was absolutely true; and when this bill was introduced and was considered by the committee it was absolutely true; but for the purposes of this case, evidently, they have brought in a bill of lading, a new one that never was known before, dated February, 1902, probably brought in here, I do not say by Senators, but brought in by the steamship companies to affect this case and to show that there is another line that charges something else.

Mr. HALE. That is new matter.

Mr. NELSON. This bill of lading is new. The bill of lading that the Senator from New Hampshire had in his hand is dated February, 1902, after Mr. Choate had made his report, after I had introduced the bill, and after the hearings had taken place before the committee.

Mr. HALE. In other words, the Senator says that the introduction of this bill, which is against clauses of this kind, resulted in other companies adopting them.

Mr. SPOONER. For the purpose of affecting this legislation.

Mr. HALE. Is not that rather a strained construction? You can not introduce a clause of that kind in a bill of lading which is not agreed to by both parties. It is entirely blistering the subject to draw that conclusion. It is an absurd proposition that the clause is so bad that the moment it is agitated the companies begin to put it into other bills of lading. It is used by other companies, and the bill—without the Senator being of that order, and he is not; he is outright and direct—is disingenuous in this respect. It does not apply to London and to London alone. The arguments and appeals made here ought not to be very dangerous in the Senate of the United States on the ground that we are discriminated against, because the bill does not apply to the London trade alone. It says:

> Any vessel transporting merchandise or property from or between ports of the United States and foreign ports.

It applies to the whole world. It is not intended to apply to the London trade and the grievances with respect to London. I am going to move to strike out the words "foreign ports" and insert "the port of London;" and the Senator will not agree to that, because that is not his object. The truth is, we do not know what will result from this bill. We do know that it is an absurd bill on its face and that every proposition that has been made in defense of it has been contradicted.

However, prior to moving that amendment I move as an amendment the substitute which I send to the desk. I ask that it be read. If it carries, it will end the business. If not, I shall then move to strike out the words "foreign ports" and insert "the port of London."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

> SECTION 1. That it shall not be lawful for the manager, agent, master, or owner of any vessel hereafter transporting merchandise or property from ports of the United States to the port of London, England, to insert in any bill of lading or shipping document any clause, covenant, or agreement whereby there is imposed on any such merchandise or property or on the consignee or consignees thereof the payment of any port, harbor, dock, landing, lifting, weighing, or sorting charges, or charges of any kind for the discharge or delivery thereof, the payment of which is by the laws, statutes, or customs in force at the said port of London imposed on such manager, agent, master, or owner, or any persons or agencies other than the consignee or consignees thereof, or which charges are contrary to said laws, statutes, or customs; or any clause, covenant, or agreement whereby are impaired the rights or privileges granted to the consignee or consignees of such merchandise or property by such laws, statutes, or customs; and any or all words or clauses of such import inserted in bills of lading or shipping receipts shall be null and void and of no effect.
> SEC. 2. That this act shall not apply to any contracts made previous to its passage, and shall take effect on and after September 1, 1902.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I always find myself more or less in a state of trepidation when I differ with the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] in any argument which he makes in this body. I think to-morrow morning, when the Senator from Connecticut reads in the RECORD what he has uttered in the Senate this morning, he will be inclined to correct some of his statements. That Senator saw no difference between the principle underlying this bill and the proposition in Congress that no horse could be sold in the United States without a warrant.

The sale of chattels by one citizen to another is purely a private matter, and purely a matter of private contract. There is no more similarity between that transaction and the transactions which are attempted to be regulated by this bill than there is—it is difficult to illustrate the difference. It is enough to say that there is none whatever. Does the Senator from Connecticut deny that our Constitution confers upon the Congress of the United States the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No; I do not deny that.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator deny that the power to regulate commerce among the States and to regulate commerce with foreign nations involves the power to regulate the instrumentalities of commerce?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. SPOONER. And does the Senator from Connecticut find any similarity between that power conferred by the Constitution on the Congress and the power to regulate horse trades?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not think I said it was precisely the same thing. What I did say was this, that I thought this was the exercise of a power which we ought not to exercise, and to descend, as I said, from the sublime to the ridiculous; if we are going into this matter we might at last come to the matter of regulating horse trade. That is about what I said.

Mr. SPOONER. The trouble with the Senator's illustration is that there is no earthly connection between the sublime and the ridiculous, as he states it.

It has been the custom of Congress, as it has been the custom of the States, to regulate bills of lading and to protect shippers against fine-print contracts exempting the carrier from the common-law liability. Congress has exercised this power in the Harter Act. Up to the time that act was passed you would find in the bills of lading, you would find in the contracts for the carriage of passengers, in fine print, not to be read by the common eye, elaborate stipulations, covenants, releases, agreements, exempting the carrier from all of the common-law liabilities which attach to the contract of carriage, even exempting the carrier from liability for injuries the result of his own negligence and default.

So Congress passed the Harter Act, prohibiting ocean carriers from inserting in their bills of lading provisions exempting them from the common-law duties and liabilities of the carrier. If that be not entirely competent, if there be anything ridiculous in it, then there is nothing of any worth in that provision of the Constitution of the United States which confers upon the Congress the power to regulate commerce among the several States and with foreign nations.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] says there are not three Senators in this body who understand this bill or anything about the subject. He may be right about that. But if he is, it is no compliment to the Senate. The bill has been the subject of careful investigation. It was the subject of investigation, by order of the State Department, by the ambassador at London, who made an elaborate report upon it. It has been investigated by committees of this body and of the House. There was a majority report in favor of it in the House. Of course the Senator from Maine discovered stability in the minority report and not the majority report, because the minority report is in harmony with his views. There has been a very careful examination of it here. If Senators know nothing about it, it is because they have not had the time to investigate it.

The Senator says this interferes with the liberty of contracts. That is true in a sense, but it is following innumerable precedents in that respect.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator if it is not rather an extreme statement to say that there are innumerable precedents?

Mr. SPOONER. No; it is not.

Mr. HALE. There are some. I will ask the Senator further, Does he not think that the fewer cases we have where Congress interferes with parties making contracts the better?

Mr. SPOONER. I am not in favor of paternalism in government. I believe that the laws of a business, as a rule, should be permitted to take their course.

Mr. HALE. Do they not generally work out all right?

Mr. SPOONER. But an exception to that rule always has been, and very often has to be, in the exercise of the legislative power of the Government to restrain carriers from imposing upon shippers by these complicated contracts.

Mr. HALE. Has not almost everything that has ever been done by legislative intervention touching contracts by carriers been done in relation to efforts to avoid the common-law liability of carriers?

Mr. SPOONER. Partly so.

Mr. HALE. Small-print clauses——

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Furtively arranged, which interfere with that great general proposition which covers the duties of common-law carriers. Almost everything has been upon that and not upon the mere question of rates and upon a mere question of what shall be paid. That has been left always to the parties themselves.

Mr. SPOONER. The parties themselves hardly ever read these contracts. They are drawn by skillful lawyers. I myself have drawn some of them in years gone by.

Mr. HOAR. That proves what the Senator has just said.

Mr. SPOONER. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts. I am representing another people now.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; the people. It is a fact that these fine-print contracts are not and can not in one case out of a hundred be read by the shipper.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The people understand this.

Mr. SPOONER. They understand this when they are squeezed. They understand this when they find they are discriminated against. They understand this when they find it is enforced against no similar cargo from anywhere else.

Mr. HALE. It is.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. HALE. I know it is.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator says he does.

Mr. HALE. I have the best proof of it.

Mr. SPOONER. That these bills of lading——

Mr. HALE. Not only that, but a half a dozen other things.

Mr. SPOONER. What are they? Does the Senator refer to this bill of lading?

Mr. HALE. That is only one case.

Mr. SPOONER. Has the Senator ever seen any other such bill of lading?

Mr. HALE. Not lately.

Mr. SPOONER. When?

Mr. HALE. Last winter, when this matter first came up.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] spoke with absolute accuracy when he said that these contracts are signed in a sort of duress, because if the shipper will not accept the bill of lading, no matter how it is framed, the carrier will not transport the freight. The carrier takes the shipper by the throat, and he must agree to the bill of lading. He need not take the trouble to read it, because it is a mere question whether he will accept it or whether he will allow his products to rot in a depot or warehouse.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question about this matter?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the question has been abundantly answered in the debate, but I have been absent. I was unaware that this subject was coming up, and I have not investigated it as my duty perhaps required me to do. I have a great deal of sympathy, if I am not detaining the Senator too much——

Mr. SPOONER. Not at all.

Mr. HOAR. I have a great deal of sympathy with the argument he has just made. I went through, in my younger days, when I was practicing law, with this whole experience with regard to contracts for life and fire insurance, the tucking in, in the by-laws and in remote places, as the Senator has said, in fine print, of all sorts of clauses that really protected the shipper from any liability whatever in substance; and we cut it all up by the roots in Massachusetts by providing a form for all insurance policies.

Mr. SPOONER. By law.

Mr. HOAR. By law.

Mr. HALE. We have done the same thing in Maine.

Mr. HOAR. Yes. I quite agree it is a proper matter for legislation by Congress to determine whether the carrier shall exempt himself from ordinary common-law liability as to care and so on, and also whether the carrier shall be permitted to pay and charge to the shipper unlawful charges abroad. Now, those two things, which are in this bill, so far as I am at present advised, have my hearty sympathy, but I want to ask the Senator about something where I suppose I misunderstood the Senator from Minnesota, because the bill does not carry out what he says. I refer to the tenth line of the first section, on the second page.

Suppose the dock charge, or the landing, or the weighing, or the sorting charge, whatever you may name it, be a lawful charge in the foreign country, whether it is unreasonable, whether it is a discrimination against us or not. Suppose it to be lawful, so that the goods can not be landed without somebody paying it. Does the Senator think it is just to say that under such circumstances—for instance, under such circumstances as that 50 cents a ton shall be paid, or a dollar per ton, or any other charge on the merchandise there, the payment of which the carrier can not help—the carrier shall charge the shipper just the same, whether the carrier has to pay that burden and can not help himself or not? That is the one thing which troubles me about this bill. Do I make myself clear to the Senator?

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me?

Mr. HOAR. Hold on; let me finish. If I have made that question clear to the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. SPOONER. I understand the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. Then I will not detain the Senator longer. Does not this bill say in substance to the carrier, "Whether or not you pay a dollar a ton more and can not help yourself, your charge for carriage shall be exactly the same?" And is that just?

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that this bill does not relate to any charge which the steamship companies have to pay.

Mr. HOAR. Look at the tenth and eleventh lines.

Mr. NELSON. I will read.

Mr. HOAR. Let me see.

Mr. NELSON. Let me read.

Mr. HOAR. The bill refers, as I understand it, first, to charges the payment of which is imposed by the laws, statutes, or customs, and, second, to charges which are illegal. In neither case shall the carrier get any more from the shipper.

Mr. SPOONER. I am speaking of the principle and of what seems to me to be an evil which ought to be remedied. So far as concerns the language to which the Senator from Massachusetts calls attention and which I have just read, it seems to justify the criticism which he makes upon it. In other words, it seems to be a provision of law, if this be enacted, prohibiting the carrier from imposing upon the cargo, to be paid by the shipper, charges which are imposed by the law of the country at the port of destination.

Mr. NELSON. No.

Mr. SPOONER. It seems to me, speaking hastily, that it is distinguishable in that respect from the other provisions of the bill which prohibit the carrier from imposing upon the shipper charges which are against the custom or against the law of the country in which is situated the port of delivery. I may be wrong.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is utterly mistaken.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well; I will listen to the Senator's explanation.

Mr. NELSON. I will read the language of the bill. The language is perfectly plain. It commences at the end of line 5:

Or any clause, covenant, or agreement whereby there is imposed on any such merchandise or property, or on the consignee or consignees thereof, the payment of any port, harbor, dock, landing, lifting, weighing, or sorting charges, or charges of any kind for the discharge or delivery thereof, the payment of which is by the laws, statutes, or customs of the foreign country or countries to which such merchandise or property shall be transported imposed on such manager, agent, master, or owner, or any persons or agencies other than the consignee or consignees thereof——

Mr. SPOONER. Well, now——

Mr. HOAR. Put the word "not" in the eleventh line.

Mr. SPOONER. What follows?

Mr. NELSON. I will read:

Or which charges are contrary to the said laws, statutes, or customs, etc.

Meaning the laws, statutes, or customs of the foreign country.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I read:

Or any clause, covenant, or agreement whereby are impaired the rights or privileges granted to the consignee or consignees of such merchandise or property by the laws, statutes, or customs of the foreign country or countries to which such merchandise or property shall be transported.

Now, if the cargo, when it arrives at a foreign port, is subject by the laws and customs of that country—by the laws governing that port—to any of the dock charges or to any other charges of delivery that the vessel owner has to pay, this does not relieve the shipper from that charge, and the shipowner has a right to pay it.

Mr. SPOONER. The only question which the Senator from Massachusetts makes is whether or not the word "not" ought not to be inserted before the word "imposed."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The Senator, who is in the habit of reducing things to few words and of arriving at the real point in a controversy, has just made a proposition which will be accepted here in one moment.

Mr. SPOONER. Then I must be wrong.

Mr. HALE. The Senator sometimes——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Maine would accept the proposition, I am afraid of it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator sometimes is ingenious, but wrong. However, he has just made a proposition that there shall be no exemption in the bill where the rates covered in the charge are provided by law in the foreign country. We do not object to a bill that goes no further than that. Confine this bill to items that are imposed contrary to the law that is in force in other countries and we will take it in one minute.

Mr. SPOONER. Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.

Mr. HALE. Ah, it is the Senator's own suggestion. I do not want him to be frightened by the earnest manner of the Senator from Minnesota out of a proposition which he himself has made.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not absolutely certain that the language of the bill in that respect is not subject to the criticism made upon it by the Senator from Massachusetts. The language of the bill I have not studied, but I am quite certain that it is not fair that a bill of lading of a cargo of flour or a cargo of lumber (although the Senator from Connecticut for some reason or other would take those products of this country out of account in their relation to foreign commerce) should be subject to charges in London to which cargoes of lumber and cargoes of flour are not subject when coming from Russia or any other country in the world—imposing dock charges upon cargoes from North Atlantic ports which are not imposed upon cargoes from the Gulf ports even.

I do not understand that there is any good reason for this discrimination. It is considered the function of Congress to protect the industries of the United States against discriminations abroad. We have passed over and over again in our tariff laws provisions to confer authority, where governments discriminated against products of the United States, to countervail that discrimination here by an increase of duties or by necessary regulations.

For Senators to say that the millers of the Northwest have no right to come to Congress and object that under duress carriers which we have the power to regulate are imposing charges upon cargoes of flour at the port of London which are not imposed upon cargoes of flour from other ports is a novel doctrine to me.

If it can not cost any more to deliver or discharge a cargo of flour at the docks of London, if it came from the United States or from the North Atlantic ports, than it would cost to discharge the same cargo of flour if it came from any other country, it is a wrong. It is a discrimination that has no foundation in justice, although it may have one in custom.

I have not studied the language of the bill—my friend from Minnesota has—and I am not prepared to say that the words in the eleventh and twelfth lines are aptly drawn, but I am prepared to say that underlying this proposition is a just complaint of our people which the Congress has the power to remedy and which can not be sneered or laughed out of Congress.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps I am interrupting at the wrong time, but I want to make a suggestion.

Mr. SPOONER. No, sir; at any time.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand the Senator from Minnesota, who is a very careful and thorough lawyer, as I have had eminent reason to know in committee service with him, the bill does not mean as it is drawn what I was afraid it did, to wit, that the carrier can not recover from the shipper, even if the parties agree, certain charges which he can not help paying when he gets there. Of course I do not want to hold the Senator to a statement made in reply when on his feet, but I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that he is not as yet quite clear that the bill does not mean what I think it does, and I believe both Senators agree that it ought not to mean what I think it means. The Senator from Minnesota disclaims such a meaning and the Senator from Wisconsin, I understand, agrees that it ought not to mean it.

Now, as far as one vote is concerned, I will vote for the bill if the Senator from Minnesota will put that into language which the Senator from Wisconsin will say means exactly what the Senator from Minnesota says it ought to mean. There can not be anything in making that offer that can be the subject of any possible suspicion. Those two Senators, who are the principal champions of the bill, are agreed that it ought to mean just such a thing as this, and therefore if they will further agree that the language does mean that, for one there will not be any further opposition to the bill from me.

Mr. SPOONER. As I said to the Senator from Massachusetts, I have not studied with care the language of the bill. Custom ordinarily, to have the force of law, is universal in its operation, the facts or the conditions being the same. I do not want to agree that a custom at the port of London that there shall be imposed upon cargoes from the United States certain charges which are not imposed upon the same cargoes from other countries; is a custom which ought to be recognized or protected by our legislation.

Mr. HOAR. No; it is not recognized.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. So, as I said before, rather thinking aloud than otherwise, I have been rather of the impression that the language to which the Senator from Massachusetts has called attention might be framed so as to reach more clearly than it does the evils sought to be arrived at.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will frame it so, I will vote for it.

Mr. SPOONER. But the Senator from Minnesota studied this with great care, and I should like to hear his view of this language. I desire to hear what he has to say.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, before the Senator from Minnesota proceeds, it seems to me that the language is not susceptible of the construction placed upon it by the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not think it is. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin unduly, but if he will allow me to make a suggestion I think upon examination he will see that my explanation of it is correct.

There are three things prohibited in this bill. In the first place, there is in the original bill the prohibition against the insertion of any clause which will relieve the carrier from any "loss or damage arising from negligence, fault, or failure in proper loading, stowage, custody, care, or proper delivery" of the property, etc. That is a distinct prohibition of itself. There is no ambiguity about that.

The next one is simply that there shall be no clause inserted by which the carrier shall be relieved of an obligation that the law of the foreign country imposes upon him. That is as plain as language can make it.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator is right about that.

Mr. BACON. It does not go to the extent suggested by the Senator from Connecticut of interfering with the right of parties to make a contract in a particular or a general sense, but it simply says that where the law of the foreign country imposes a certain obligation upon the carrier there shall be no contract made in this country which shall relieve the carrier of that obligation and impose it upon the shipper.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Does the Senator from Georgia understand that the law of the London docks imposes any obligation whatever upon the carrier?

Mr. BACON. I do so understand.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not understand that it imposes any obligation whatever upon the carrier.

Mr. BACON. That is my information. If it does not, then this can do no harm, because that is all it does. I will read the language to the Senator, and I am sure he must agree with me.

Or any clause—

That is, there shall be no clause imposed of a certain kind; or, in the second place, any clause—covenant, or agreement whereby there is imposed on any such merchandise or property, or on the——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is, on "merchandise or property;" not on the carrier.

Mr. BACON. But this is the prohibition against a clause being inserted in the bill of lading—imposed on any such merchandise or property, or on the consignee or consignees thereof, the payment of any port, harbor, dock, landing, lifting, weighing, or sorting charges, or charges of any kind for the discharge or delivery thereof—

If it ended there, it would mean that they could not have any clause which imposed any charge for any of that service, but it is qualified by what follows:

The payment of which—

And to this I call the attention of Senators—speaking of these charges which can not be put upon the consignee—the payment of which is by the laws, statutes, or customs of the foreign country or countries to which such merchandise or property shall be transported imposed on such manager, agent, master, or owner, or any persons or agencies other than the consignee or consignees thereof.

In other words, where the law of the country imposes that as a charge upon the carrier there shall not be a contract made in this country which shall relieve the carrier of that obligation and impose it upon the shipper. That is all there is in it.

The third class of contract which is prohibited is one which would impose upon the shipper any charge which is unlawful in that country.

There are three distinct classes of contracts which are prohibited. One is against negligence. The other is against a charge which the law of the country imposes upon the carrier. The other is against the imposition of a charge which is prohibited in that country. That is all there is in it. Those are the three.

Mr. HOAR. That is exactly the point. The Senator states it very fairly and clearly. Suppose, for instance, to take an extreme case, the port of Hamburg should impose on the carrier a tax for bringing the goods into the port equal to his entire freight money. This proposed statute says, as it is, the carrier shall not make a contract with the shipper that if he has to pay to get those goods into port every dollar that he is to receive for carrying them, the shipper shall repay to the carrier any part of it. Now, that is this proposed law, and it is not fair.

Mr. BACON. I think that is not a supposable case. In the first place——

Mr. HOAR. That is the proposed law. We are not even saying that the carrier shall not diminish his freight rates to some extent, but we are saying that in no case shall a great miller in Minnesota, like our old friend Mr. Washburn, or Mr. Pillsbury, or any of those great men, agree with a steamship company that if that company has to pay a certain port charge its rates of freight shall be regulated accordingly by an agreement between the parties. It seems to me that it is prohibiting two able men, both thoroughly understanding what they are about and with their eyes wide open, from making a contract which in itself is absolutely just and reasonable on both sides.

Mr. BACON. The question as to whether or not a contract is reasonable in Hamburg is a question for the Hamburg authorities to settle.

Mr. HOAR. No; this contract is made in this country entirely.

Mr. BACON. I understand that. I am speaking about the law of the contract. The presumption reasonably is that the authorities in Hamburg, if they are the ones who legislate in reference to the matter, will make laws imposing burdens which are just to the carrier. They are the persons to judge of that. In the case of Hamburg, as that is the one cited by the Senator, the authorities pass a law in which they say that when a ship comes into the port of Hamburg the charges of lighterage shall be paid by the carrier.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me and allow me to finish what I was about to say——

Mr. HOAR. What interest has Hamburg in the question whether the carrier or the shipper ought to pay it? All the interest it has is to get it.

Mr. BACON. But they do make laws of that kind; and if they do not do it this bill does not accomplish anything. It does not hurt anybody. If there is no such law, then there is no prohibition against the clause being inserted in the contract. The bill simply proposes——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BACON If the Senator will let me finish the sentence, I will yield with great pleasure.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. This bill simply proposes that where the law of any foreign country imposes a certain obligation upon the carrier the carrier shall not relieve himself of that obligation by making a contract with the shipper that instead of the carrier the shipper will do what the law of that country says the carrier shall do. That is all there is in it. I now yield with pleasure to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I am getting more and more into confusion about this matter. I certainly thought I said that there was some charge imposed on the shipper in London, and if I did, I was immediately contradicted by the Senator from Minnesota, who said that there was no charge imposed upon the shipper in London.

Mr. BACON. You mean by law?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. By law or by custom, or by anything else.

Mr. BACON. If not by law or custom, it does not mean anything, in my judgment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If it does not mean anything, we had better not pass it.

Mr. BACON. My information is that the origin of this proposed legislation was the fact that there was such a law existing; that that law was nullified by contracts made in this country, and that the purpose of this proposed law is to prevent the nullification of that law in England which imposes a certain duty upon the carrier in the port of London. If there is no such law, then of course this proposed law is useless.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Then the thing comes down in the mind of the Senator from Georgia to this, that by the law, as it exists in London, these freighters have got to pay certain charges, but we here propose to say that they shall not put into the bill of lading a clause which——

Mr. BACON. Relieves them of it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Which relieves them of it.

Mr. BACON. That is exactly what I understand to be the purpose of the proposed law. According to the law in England certain charges devolve upon the carrier. By the practice here a contract is made by which the carrier is relieved of that obligation, and it is imposed upon the shipper, and this proposed law intends that that contract shall not be made, but that the parties when they get to London shall have these obligations settled by the law as it exists in London.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And then——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. NELSON. If there is no one ready to speak on the canal bill I ask unanimous consent that we may proceed with this bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, certain matters have come up to-day and I want to have an opportunity to see just what the language of this proposed statute does cover. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is right about it, and that there ought to be the word "not" put in there.

Mr. NELSON. The word "not" would entirely destroy the whole thing.

Mr. HALE. I do not think it would. There is a controversy about that, and I want to look at it. I can not consent to go on now, because I am not ready to consider that subject, which has come up lately. The bill will come up to-morrow morning; and that will be the end of it undoubtedly. But here Senators are at odds about almost everything in the bill. The discussion to-day has brought out new matter entirely. The Senator from Massachusetts, not hostile to the bill, proposes an amendment that even the Senator from Wisconsin thinks is a right and just amendment. The Senator from Minnesota says that it will destroy the bill. I do not think it will. But there is not time now to consider it, and we all want a chance to look at that point which has been raised lately. Therefore I must object to going on at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Obection is made.

Mr. HALE. I shall not object to-morrow morning because I want the bill out of the way.

FOOD ADULTERATION, ETC.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that on next Monday, after the routine morning business, I shall ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 3342) for preventing the adulteration, misbranding, and imitations of foods, beverages, candies, drugs, and condiments in the District of Columbia and the Territories, and for regulating interstate traffic therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I desire to state to the Senator from North Dakota that that would interfere with the pending unanimous-consent agreement in respect to the London dock clause bill, unless it is disposed of before that time.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that it will not displace any bill of which notice has already been given.

Mr. GALLINGER. I also want to suggest that a request that I made has priority even over the bill the Senator from Minnesota has in charge.

Mr. NELSON. I do not understand it in that way. The request was for unanimous consent for last Monday and it went over. The request the Senator now makes is subsequent to the unanimous consent given in respect to the London dock clause bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I make no request about it. The unanimous-consent agreement will show that the Senator's bill is subject to a previous notice I had made; that is all. I am not going to interfere with the Senator's bill, but I want to reserve my rights.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3110) to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Mr. HANNA. There is no one representing the Panama side of this question prepared to go on this afternoon. We occupied the time yesterday, and I suppose that to-day the time will be occupied by the other side.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to state to the Senator from Ohio that it is the intention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to go on to-day. He has been called out of the Chamber for a few moments.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire, before the debate begins, the parliamentary condition of the bill relating to the amendments. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Is there any pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. None has been offered.

Mr. HOAR. I move the following as a substitute, which I send to the desk. It is another bill, but the clerks will of course modify the beginning of it. I move it as a substitute for the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to have the amendment printed and lie on the table?

Mr. HOAR. I desire to have it printed. It was read at length when I introduced it as a separate bill, so that it is not necessary, unless the Senate desire, to have it read at length now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator desires to have it printed?

Mr. HOAR. Let it be printed and be the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be the pending amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it an amendment to the bill reported by the majority of the committee?

Mr. HOAR. It is an amendment by way of a substitute.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, yesterday, after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS], I took the floor for the purpose of laying before the Senate some papers of importance.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon,	Culberson,	Hoar,	Patterson,
Bard,	Deboe,	Jones, Ark.	Perkins,
Bate,	Dillingham,	Kean,	Platt, Conn.
Berry,	Elkins,	Kittredge,	Platt, N. Y.
Blackburn,	Fairbanks,	McCumber,	Scott,
Burnham,	Foraker,	McLaurin, S. C.	Simmons,
Burrows,	Foster, La.	Mallory,	Spooner,
Burton,	Foster, Wash.	Martin,	Taliaferro,
Clapp,	Frye,	Millard,	Teller.
Clark, Mont.	Gallinger,	Mitchell,
Clay,	Hanna,	Morgan,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Nelson,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it was not my misfortune that a quorum was called for. I am addressing my remarks on this occasion and on this subject to the people of the United States. I am trying with sincere care to furnish the Senate with actual information bearing upon this great question, to which we can not shut our eyes. If Senators ever expect to study any question in the light of the facts that bear upon it and the law that governs it, they are bound to study these facts; otherwise they are bound to come under the condemnation of the people of the United States.

It is a matter of no concern to me whether there is or not a large body of Senators present to listen to what I have to say. It never is. I feel more free to speak in the presence of a few men who are interested in a question and who are willing to give a sincere attention to the arguments and the facts in the case than I am to speak in the presence of a larger collection who have gathered here through some sentiment or some political excitement, in the absence of which the Senate usually dissolves into thin attendance.

On yesterday when I desired to take the floor, and did take the floor, I yielded it to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] for the purpose of making an effort for a few moments to get a reconsideration of a bill that seems to have passed under unfortunate circumstances. I then desired to put into the RECORD some official papers of a most important character, which no Senator in this body, whether he is present or absent, can refuse to notice and refuse to study, for they bear directly upon the most important issue perhaps, or at least one of the most important issues, that are presented in this entire case.

I had then received, Mr. President, a letter from Mr. Calvo, who is the minister of Costa Rica, stating the attitude of that Government on this subject as far as he is at present authorized to state it. This communication states the attitude of Costa Rica, which has been very much misrepresented—I do not say purposely, for I think it is done inattentively—by the report of the minority of the committee, which misrepresents the attitude of Costa Rica in this regard. I will now ask that the letter may be read at the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 7, 1902.

MY DEAR Mr. SENATOR: It gives me pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant and report mentioned therein. In answer thereto, and, in view of the reference made to the concessions granted by my country to the Maritime Canal Company in 1888, whereby my country is considered to be bound by the contract then signed, I will say that the terms of said contract clearly define the obligations of both the contracting parties, and that, without entering into an analysis of this document, it can be readily seen that by its own wording it has expired by limitation. No declaration has been made by my Government in this respect, it is true, but on the other hand no extension of time has been granted thereon.

It is not my purpose to make at the present time any declaration defining the views of my Government on such points, but wish only to present the facts as they are in preservation of the rights involved, which, I may add, as far as Costa Rica is concerned, are all confirmed by the history of the above-mentioned concessions. Nevertheless, you are aware that acting on principles of equity in the pending negotiations of a treaty for the construction of the canal, as proposed in a draft submitted by his excellency the Secretary of State, provision is made for the settlement of any conflicting rights, if any, that may be claimed in this connection.

Moreover, Costa Rica has not granted any other concession to any citizens, corporation, or government for the construction of a canal, or for any other work that may conflict with the pending negotiations with the United States, and therefore my Government was free to sign the proctocol of December 1, 1900, for the construction by the United States of an interoceanic canal through its territory and that of the Republic of Nicaragua.

In regard to said protocol, I wish to say that no better proof can be given of the desire of my Government to stand by its terms than the interest shown in the steps taken to smooth the way for the final negotiation of a treaty for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal—if that route is chosen—as well as by the fact that I am advised by my Government that a proposition with that end in view will arrive soon, of which I have had the honor to inform his excellency the Secretary of State.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, my dear Mr. Senator, yours, very sincerely,

J. B. CALVO.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
United States Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the attitude of Nicaragua toward this question is precisely that stated in the letter of Mr. Calvo, with the addition that Nicaragua presented the draft of a convention for the purpose of carrying into effect the obligation that the President of the United States agreed upon with both those States in December, 1900.

I do not choose at this moment, because I want to put some other papers before the Senate, to discuss to any extent the effect of these protocols, as they are called—these agreements—of December, 1900. A more binding, solemn, and complete contract was never entered into between two governments than the protocols of December, 1900, signed, sealed, and delivered between these Governments, and still adhered to and insisted upon, as the Senate sees, in the letter of Mr. Calvo, and also in the letter of Mr. Corea, the minister of Nicaragua, which the Secretary of State has sent officially to this body, and which is printed in the proceedings of the Senate.

Here are those two States insisting upon those agreements as being obligatory upon both those Governments and the United States; but both of those agreements are conditioned upon a single event—not that we will accept the protocols or the agreements by special provision of law, but that we will authorize the President of the United States to acquire the rights from Nicaragua and Costa Rica that are described in those protocols, as they are called, which are absolute agreements.

In the course of my remarks I will take up for discussion somewhat more fully the character of those protocols and the obligations which they impose.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I infer from the statement of the Senator that he means that by those protocols the Government of the United States is obligated to adopt that route? Does he mean that?

Mr. MORGAN. If the President of the United States is authorized by Congress to acquire those rights, the perpetual and exclusive right to build a canal on that route, then those agreements become obligatory.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Congress of the United States should determine to authorize the President to adopt that route, does the Senator say that those agreements would be in force, but not before?

Mr. MORGAN. They are all dependent upon the condition that the Congress of the United States authorize the President to acquire; not that Congress provides the particular agreement in the form in which it is made, but authorizes the President to acquire those rights as they are described in those protocols.

Mr. CULLOM. What I want to have the Senator state clearly is that the Congress of the United States is entirely free in its legislation to determine what route shall be selected.

Mr. MORGAN. Entirely free. That is my comprehension of the situation; but I want to make some comment upon it that it is proper I should make, so that the Senate may consider it.

There are many things that have been accomplished in this country that we know nothing about and had no hand in at all, and perhaps it is time we were looking into them.

The President of the United States, as the constitutional diplomatic agent of this Government, has got the same rights under the law of nations and under the Constitution of the United States that the crowned head of any foreign government has got or any diplomatic agent has got to make those engagements with foreign countries that are not actually required to be ratified by the Senate, of which there are a number. We have made many of them, some of them of the highest importance, to two or three of which I shall now refer.

The President might very well have concluded this contract and made it obligatory upon the United States if he had chosen to do it, as it is only the acceptance of a conveyance. He did not choose to do it, but he put in as one of the terms of the contract that the agreements are to become obligatory when Congress authorizes the President to make agreements of that character—not these particular ones, but agreements that contain these powers and rights.

Those cases to which I am referring in my mind for illustration in the situation which we are in and the powers of the President of the United States are, first, those that relate to the arming of ships on the Great Lakes of the North. That was a mere diplomatic agreement until the Senate, I think in order to get out of what we supposed to be a diplomatic difficulty, passed a resolution a year or two afterwards affirming that diplomatic agreement. We have had diplomatic agreements with other foreign countries made final and conclusive by the President of the United States, without Congress knowing anything about them or the Senate pretending to act on them. Perhaps the most notable recent instance of that sort is in the case of China.

Who here in this body ever saw a copy of the agreement signed between the President of the United States and the Government of China or any of the other powers that were collected there for the purpose of disposing of the great questions in respect to the future of the Chinese Empire? Who ever saw a copy of it? Who can repeat it? Who can give the date of it? What was it? You do not know and I do not know. Why do we not know? Because the President made an agreement absolutely conclusive upon the Government of the United States and China by his signing it without our assistance or interference. That is a diplomatic agreement.

What does that agreement carry? I do not know how many millions, but more than twenty millions of bonds that are now due to the Government of the United States bearing interest, and we are collecting interest on them. How we ever got China in debt to us and how it becomes her duty to pay these bonds I am unable to state as a Senator, and so you are all unable to state. I do not complain of it. I think it was right. I think it was within the diplomatic powers of the President to conduct the business with China in that way, and even to decline—he has not declined—even to abstain from informing the Senate or Congress about it. I think it was right and within the range of his diplomatic powers; but at the same time I do not approve of the practice. I think it is a very questionable, and almost, I might say, censurable practice.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, a report was made. I saw the other day a statement in the newspapers to the effect that the Secretary of State had taken the responsibility of reducing the portion of the debt that comes to the United States by about a million dollars, and that he had also induced the representatives of the different powers to do the same thing.

Mr. MORGAN. Inasmuch as the newspapers furnish the Senate with a great part of its information and many of its opinions and enforce their conclusions upon many of us, it is very well to consult the newspapers as to what is going on in the Government, but I do not know, nor do you, nor does anybody here know.

Suppose China should say: "We will not pay these bonds to the United States Government because the Senate of the United States did not ratify this diplomatic agreement, and your Constitution requires that it shall be ratified by the Senate"—suppose they make that point, I think there would be difficulty in answering it. I would not like to undertake to answer that question if China should make it as to the reduction of the interest as suggested by the Senator from Illinois.

I make no question about it; but I am showing to you what Mr. McKinley might have done when he signed these protocols; that is, instead of referring these proctocols to Congress for ratification he might have made a bargain out and out, and we would have been very glad to have accepted it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield.

Mr. TELLER. I want to ask the Senator if he thinks that these protocols were properly made, as I understand he does?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. Whether they were made under the general power the President has to make, as the Senator thinks, these diplomatic agreements or by virtue of some statute by which we authorized the President to make them?

Mr. MORGAN. The general constitutional power.

Mr. TELLER. Was there any statute authorizing the President to do this?

Mr. MORGAN. No; and if there had been the contract would have been perfectly obligatory. That is exactly what the Hepburn bill now before the Senate seeks to provide, that Congress will authorize him to do it, and when he is so authorized the contract is completed.

Mr. TELLER. I wish the Senator, before he concludes, would just state to us how he distinguishes between a diplomatic agreement and a treaty—what is a proper subject for a treaty and what is a proper thing to incorporate in a diplomatic agreement.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I believe that is more than any man knows. I do not know, and I have looked into it until I have got pretty nearly dazed, at times, trying to find out the distinction between a diplomatic agreement and a treaty under our Constitution. That is what the Senator means, I suppose.

Mr. TELLER. Of course.

Mr. MORGAN. I notice in the constitution of Colombia here, and in some other constitutions that I have had an opportunity to examine, that the organic law provides a distinction between diplomatic agreements which the executive may complete and a treaty which the executive can not complete; and in those constitutions they draw the distinction upon the line between convention and treaty. The difficulty is in ascertaining what is a convention and what is a treaty.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator will not object to my stating that we have no such provision in our Constitution?

Mr. MORGAN. Of course, we have none. There is where the difficulty comes in. We have got to judge for ourselves, and we have laid down in our Government so many precedents which I could bring here—we have laid down so many precedents that we have finally reached the ground that the President of the United States has in many instances, notably in the instance of China, the right to conclude, perfect, and execute agreements without referring them to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. Or without reporting them to Congress?

Mr. MORGAN. Or without reporting them to Congress.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but I should like to enter my objection to that as a statement of American constitutional law.

Mr. MORGAN. The honorable Senator from Colorado has been in this body and in the public service for a great many years and long with the great dominant ruling power. While he has been here these things have been done in season and out of season, and he has made no question or objection. So he does not expect of me as a Democrat in the minority that I shall arraign all the Republican Administrations that have preceded this one in respect to their loose dealing with questions of great and intricate diplomatic concern. I leave that to the Senator to solve for himself.

Mr. President, I desire now to have read at the desk another paper which reached me this morning from the Secretary of State, and in the reading of which the Senate will see, I think, a perfect and full explanation of all the bearings of the case and the reasons why heretofore the Secretary of State has not officially laid it before the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I inquire of the Senator from whom this communication comes? I should simply like to know.

Mr. MORGAN. These names are so unpronounceable that I can not call them even when I have the text before my eyes, but our consul at Bogota communicated to the Secretary of State certain letters addressed to him by officials of the Liberal party in Colombia relating to this canal.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is this communication from the officials of the Colombian Government to the Secretary of State?

Mr. MORGAN. It depends upon who are the Colombian officials. That is what they claim to be—the representatives of that Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is all I want to know.

Mr. TELLER. That depends upon the time when the communication was sent?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; it depends on who wins in the next fight or who is thrown over in the next contest as to who is the Government there now.

I wish to say one word before the Secretary proceeds. That letter was received and put into the private files, as they are called, of the Department of State. In my request to Mr. Hay to give me information he did not feel at liberty to present these private files until I wrote to him and told him that I had the acknowledgement of the former minister of Colombia at Washington City, whose name is Silva, that this last extension of the concession to the Panama Railroad Company was void because it violated the constitution of Colombia, and that I had the further statement from other sources that in consequence of that that Congress had refused to ratify it; that thereupon the then President, whose name I forget, and his cabinet signed it: and thereupon the Congress of Colombia declared the office of President vacant and retired to the field for fighting, and they have been at it ever since. They have not settled it yet.

When I informed Mr. Hay that I had these papers I thought I was not asking him to divulge anything at all that belonged to the secret archives of this Government, but public facts relating to public history, and I thought I had a right to them, and I respectfully requested that he should send them to me. On consideration of my letter, Mr. Hay thought I had a right to them, and he sent them to me this morning, and now I ask to have them read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Filed under Colombian legation, July 16, 1900.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 16, 1900.

Hon. J. HAY,
Secretary of State, Washington. D. C.

SIR: While the Republic of Colombia was, as it still is, involved in a civil war, which is perhaps the most formidable and, so far as the revolutionary party is concerned, the most justifiable that the country has ever witnessed, and one in which the most vital interests, both individual and national, of the Colombian people are at stake; while the Republic was passing through this critical and trying period, the New Panama Canal Company succeeded in obtaining from the leader of one of the contending parties—the nominal President of the Republic—a six-year extension of the time allowed to said company for the completion of the work in the canal, which time, according to the contract now in force, expires in October of 1904.

The company, which has already employed in the time originally set for the completion of the work, besides two additional periods granted to it as extensions of that time (twenty-two years in all), had since before December, 1898, been endeavoring to obtain a new extension; and it appears from statements made by the company itself (see p. 33 of its book "The New Panama Canal Company," published by the Evening Post Printing House, New York), that at that time the functionaries that have now granted the new extension had promised it to the company, this new concession, however, being subject (as all others had been) to the ratification of Congress in its coming sessions.

Having made this statement, and recognized the restrictions expressed therein, the company adds, in the book quoted above, that the requisite ratification of Congress was insured beforehand, a declaration the truth of which can not be accepted, relating, as it does, to a country whose government is constitutionally a representative government, in which the sovereign authority is, or is assumed to be, exerted by, and only by, Congress, as the faithful representative and interpreter of the national will and opinion and the supreme judge of the acts of the Executive. Be this as it may, it should be noted that the company was aware, from the time it obtained its concession in 1878, of the fact that only the National Congress might grant or refuse, as well as extend, the concession in question.

It should also be noted that the company was at the same time conducting in Paris a negotiation ad referendum with an agent appointed by the Government as commissioner ad hoc, the result of which was also to be submitted to Congress for its approval; and that the company suddenly withdrew from these negotiations in order to deal with the leader of one of the contending parties, intending to avail itself of the "precarious" condition both of that leader himself and of his party. We may therefore affirm, without offending against either truth or justice, that the company departed from the path of equity, uprightness, and good faith, and ventured on the dark by-ways of unscrupulous dealing, expecting sooner to attain its desired object by means that might perhaps be called shrewd, but not honorable.

Fortunately for Colombia, as well as for the construction of the canal, the Liberal party—more than half the people of the Republic—rose in defense of the rights and interests of the country against the oppressive, and at the same time feeble and decrepit, government of Mr. Sanclemente; and one of its first acts was to protest, through its representatives, against the illegality of the new concession. Those protests have been in due time communicated to the representatives of the company and have been made public through the press, while their force, as the expression of what will soon be the legitimate Government of Colombia, has been strengthened by the great victories won by the revolution on the battlefields.

They seem, moreover, to have deterred the company from delivering the stipulated price to the unauthorized party that illegally conducted the negotiations and closed the contract, and this makes the contract, already void as illegal, void also on account of the company's failure or refusal to pay the amount agreed upon. By this act of the company the new concession becomes nonexisting, and the relations between the company and the Colombian Government remain what they were previously to this unsuccessful attempt at setting aside the general principles of law and justice that should govern all honorable transactions.

Legally, then, the only concession that the company holds from the Colombian Government, and the only one at present in force, is the one that expires within about four years from this date. There is no doubt that this will also be the official decision of the new Government, when it is definitively established; and as soon as that Government is recognized by friendly nations and is unimpeded by armed opposition it will proceed, by legal and constitutional means and making use of its legitimate authority, to contract (in case, of course, that the company fails to fulfill the terms of the present contract, which shall remain in force until the time of its expiration in 1904) for the construction of the canal with the company or companies, government or governments, offering the greatest security and the best guaranty of its or their recognition and respect of the rights of the Republic. It may be that by that time the New Panama Canal Company will have obtained the necessary means for the completion of the work and that that company will have the preference in the granting of a new concession.

As, however, the people and Government of the United States have for some time past been greatly concerned with the construction of an interoceanic canal; as the New Panama Canal Company has offered to this Government (according to accounts published by the American press) some participation in the form and, to the extent that this Government may deem advisable, in the privilege that the company now holds from the Colombian Government, an offer and acceptation which in any case would be in violation of article 21 of the contract of privilege enacted in 1878; as the American Government has sent technical commissions to make a study of the best route for the construction of the canal, and they may decide on the Panama route as the most advantageous; as these studies and investigations may thus lead the United States to take a direct interest in the opening of the canal across the Isthmus of Panama, the possession and control of which has been faithfully and efficaciously guaranteed and insured to Colombia by this country for over half a century—considering all these facts, and also that possibly and probably Colombia will, after the expiration of existing contracts, seek to enter into a contract with the United States, and that in case the New Panama Canal Company shall continue to hold the privilege it may, as it has done heretofore, endeavor to secure the official cooperation, in some form, of the United States, I take the liberty to present to the American Government, through you, and in the name of the Provisional Government of the Republic of Colombia, of which I have the honor to be the authorized diplomatic agent, a translation of the manifesto and letter of protest which on April 20 last was addressed to the Colombian people, to the New Panama Canal Company, and to all whom this subject may concern, by Generals G. Vargas Santos and Focion Soto, president and vice-president, respectively, of the Provisional Government.

I inclose also a translation of the letter that, in behalf of my Government, I sent to the company on the 8th of last May. All these documents have reached the company, and it seems that they have produced the required effect.

I have, sir, the honor to be, yours, very respectfully,

[SEAL.] A. J. RESTREPO.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. What is the date of the letter?

The SECRETARY. "Washington, D. C., July 16, 1900."

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Two years ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama desire to have read the documents attached to the letter?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; I wish to have them read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Copies of the manifesto and official letter, addressed by the Colombian Provisional Government to the Panama Canal Company, under the date April 20, 1900, to protest against the validity of the contract entered into between the Government of Bogota and the aforesaid company in regard to an extension of time granted to the latter.]

THE PANAMA CANAL—MANIFESTO.

Motives that are both legitimate and noble have prompted the Liberal party of Colombia to take up arms in order to insure to the country freedom to establish a régime that will guarantee the progress and the very existence of the Republic, which are to-day threatened by institutions not framed nor sanctioned by the people and by functionaries who have received their authority through absolute disregard of and violent opposition to the will and opinion of the majority of citizens.

Both nature and tradition have impelled the patriotic people of Colombia to rebel against a condition of things in which they are prevented, de jure as well as de facto, from exercising their legitimate natural rights, in which a great party has been deprived of its political freedom, and in which the pacific development of the country has been arrested. It is only after exhausting all peaceable means that war has been resorted to as a last and extreme measure—a dire means, but one dictated and imposed by necessity.

The men that are to-day struggling to recover their rights constitute the Liberal party, and form the great majority of the Colombian people. Anyone who compares the condition, both civil and political, of our people under the system of government that existed in this country for nearly half a century with the conditions created by the so-called regeneration system will no longer take that attitude of contemptuous commiseration with which our civil wars are often regarded by peoples who have already attained that liberty and security after which we are still striving, and he will understand the significance of the present revolutionary movement, which already begins to put an end forever, we hope, to the oppressive government imposed on our unfortunate country.

We, the undersigned, have the honor of being the authorized representatives of the Liberal party, and therefore of the Colombian people; and the following statements and declarations being the faithful expression of the country's will through a Government that will soon be the only recognized Government of the Republic, should carry the weight that always attaches to the utterances of a whole nation.

The contracts that the government of Dr. Manuel Antonio Sanclemente may make, without being legally authorized, therefore neither are nor will be recognized by the revolutionary government.

The President of the Republic, Dr. Sanclemente, is not empowered to make contracts involving national interests without the assent of the legislative body appointed by the people. Whatever is done without that assent is therefore void.

We make these statements mainly to prevent all negotiations relating to an extension of time in the contract now in force with the Panama Canal Company. We concur in and sanction the statements, that on the same subject, has made an authorized representative of the revolution, Dr. Alirio Diaz Guerra, and those that will be made by Dr. Antonio José Restrepo, an agent especially appointed to act for the provisional government in this and other important matters.

The relations between the company and the Republic of Colombia are of a purely civil nature and fall, of course, under the jurisdiction and laws of this country. The present Government is not empowered or authorized by any law whatsoever arbitrarily to alter the terms of the contract now in force.

The Liberal party of Colombia considers it an act of criminal resignation to allow the repudiated government to endanger the future of the country by an imprudent negotiation; and one of the objects of the war in which that party is now engaged is to prevent, or at least oppose, the further sacrifice of the interests of the Republic.

CUCUTA, April 20, 1900.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE PANAMA CANAL COMPANY, Paris.

SIR: We have been informed that the government of Mr. Sanclemente, whose authority is no longer recognized in this country, and whose very existence will soon cease to be, intends to close, through his agents, the negotiation relating to an extension of the time stipulated in the contract now in force. Although it is to the interest of every concern like the company you so ably represent to inquire into the legal faculties of parties professing to transact business in the name of a whole nation, and although we have no doubt that, in view of the circumstances, that company will abstain from entering into a contract with a government that is not legally empowered for the purpose, but whose acts in matters of this kind are subject to revision by the national Congress, we think it our duty to inform you that the provisional government of Colombia, of which we have at present the honor of being the highest officers, will not approve any alterations in the contract now in force without the assent of the legislative convention that will assemble as soon as the war is over.

Having fulfilled our duty in communicating to you this information, as well as the manifesto we have issued on the same subject, and which will be made known abroad through the foreign press, we remain, dear sir,

Yours, very respectfully,

G. VARGAS S.,
Supreme Director of the War and Chief of the Liberal Party of Colombia.
FOCION SOTO,
Major-General, Chief of the General Staff.

[Copy of the official letter addressed by Mr. A. J. Restrepo, confidential agent of the Colombian Provisional Government in the United States of America, to the Panama Canal Company, under date May 8, 1900, to protest against the validity of the contract entered into between the Government of Bogota and the aforesaid company in regard to an extension of time granted to the latter.]

NEW YORK, May 8, 1900.

Mr. PRESIDENT: On the 3d instant I had the honor to address you a cablegram in the following terms:

PRESIDENT PANAMA CANAL COMPANY, Paris:

The extension obtained at Bogota is void. The victorious revolution will not recognize it. Do not deliver your money to the government of Mr. Sanclemente. The coming convention or congress will reject that contract. Will send protest by mail.

RESTREPO,
Representative of the Revolution.

In fulfillment of the latter part of this document I send you the present letter, which is the formal protest of the Provisional Government of the Republic of Colombia, of which I am the authorized representative, against the contract of agreement lately made in Bogota between the government residing at that city and the company that you so ably represent.

It appears from cablegrams received from that capital that the Panama Canal Company has obtained a six-year extension to finish the work in the Isthmus, through certain compensations made to the Colombian Government, among which is mentioned the immediate or early payment to that Government of a large amount of money.

Not having any precise data to form an opinion as to the nature of the contract entered upon, or as to the advantages or disadvantages which would intrinsically accrue therefrom to the contracting parties (matters which, so far as the company is concerned, it is not my place to investigate, while so far as the Government is concerned, such investigation would be foreign to the object of this letter), I shall confine myself to deny, as I emphatically deny, the Government of Mr. Sanclemente the legal faculty to make a contract of this character which shall be final. It is well known that contracts made by persons not legally qualified are in themselves void.

In the sessions of the 1898 National Congress the question was discussed as to the advisibility of legislating with regard to the granting of the extension under consideration, but the discussion gave no practical results, as it led to no final decree and only served to strengthen, if that was possible, the conviction that only the Congress of the Republic might constitutionally and legally decide in one sense or another this delicate point of public administration.

Afterwards the Executive, although knowing from this discussion what the national will and opinion were, decided, not without loud protests from the press of the country, to send to France, before the company, a responsible commissioner to prepare an ad referendum contract on the extension of the expiring concession. It seemed that it was his intention to be able to present to the coming Congress a complete, logical, and luminous document, which would prove the advantageousness of the negotiation, and would make it acceptable to the Colombian people, even to those who had the least faith in the sincerity and commercial reliability of the company, whose previous extensions of time had expired without any benefit to the country or any appreciable progress in the work commenced. The prominence of the commissioner himself, Dr. Esguerra, was adduced by the Government as a guaranty of its sincerity and honorable purpose. The commissioner left, and the country waited with great anxiety.

More than a year elapsed without any news of the mission intrusted to Dr. Esguerra; more than a year of words, interviews, consultations, and procrastinations; and, when the country expected an acceptable solution, it has only received the sad news that its interests have been postponed to other interests not yet known. In October of last year civil war broke out in Colombia and the country was officially declared in a state of siege, whereby the law of the country underwent a partial, but only a partial modification. According to article 121 of the national constitution the President of the Republic became invested with certain extraordinary faculties relating to the war, and about matters of a provisional character directed to the reestablishment of peace and preservation of order. For these purposes, but not for any others, the Executive was invested with such faculties; but even within these limits all measures that it may take, its acts and its decrees, are subject to the subsequent resolutions of Congress.

Owing to the high opinion that was entertained as to Mr. Sanclemente's character, no one in Colombia thought that he would take advantage of the anomalous situation created by the civil war to meddle with forbidden subjects, interrupt a negotiation that was being conducted at Paris in an honest and decorous manner, and, violating all constitution, laws, and principles of morality, undertake the underhand work in which we now know he is engaged.

Such, however, unfortunately has been the case. I know now, and soon the whole of Colombia will know, that the Government of Mr. Sanclemente and his ministers have taken the negotiation off Dr. Esguerra's hands, and that they have made in Bogota an illegal contract without the knowledge of their own commissioner and to the great detriment of the dearest interests of the country.

The provisional government of the Republic, consisting of Gen. Vargas Santos, commander in chief of the revolutionary army, and his chief of staff, Dr. Focion Soto, were informed that something illegal, something of the nature of treason, was taking place in the official regions with respect to the canal affairs. They were apprised from Bogota itself that it was necessary for them to hasten to the defense of interests that were even of more importance than those which they were defending on the battlefield.

It was then that the new government decided to intervene in this matter, which they had thought was guarded against illegal interference, a problem which, in the hands of Dr. Esguerra, would have found a natural and just solution, and would have been subsequently considered by the sovereign authority in a partial spirit and with a liberal mind.

Under the present circumstances, however, in view of the manner and conditions in which that negotiation has been carried out, and seeing that the patriotic anticipations of my constituents have been justified, I hereby protest in their name, in the name of the liberal party of Colombia, and of all the Colombian people, not only against the form in which that negotiation may have taken place, and against its present and future validity, but also against the the presumptive lack of good faith shown by the company, who, with a knowledge of all the facts, has contracted with persons not legally qualified, and has besides ignored the ad hoc commissioner in charge of the negotiations to deal with an insignificant clique, who are on the point of being expelled from the office they have disgraced.

The company attended, through their attorneys, the sessions of the 1898 Congress, in which this matter was discussed. They afterwards began an ad referendum negotiation with the commissioner, Dr. Esguerra, and now the same company are contracting with persons that they know very well have no legal power for that purpose. It follows, therefore, that the company have acted throughout this matter with perfect knowledge of what they are doing, and to-morrow they will have no right to complain or pose as victims.

The Government for whom I have the honor of speaking represents more than one-half of the Republic. It has armies on land and men-of-war on the sea. At present it wages a civilized war against the dishonest and oppressive government that has signed the extension under consideration, and the new government does not, and will not, recognize or approve the suspicious (to say the least) concession that the canal company has just obtained at Bogota.

Whether said new government shall modify the present constitution of the country through a national convention, or whether the extension is to be considered by the ordinary Congress, the company may rest assured that the legislative representatives of the Colombian nation will never give their assent to this transaction.

Being certain that I am faithfully interpreting the wish of my constituents and of the great majority of the Colombian people; being equally certain that the revolution will be victorious in two months at the most, and not wishing the French company to lose any amount of money that they may now deliver to the Government at Bogota, I wish to warn them in time, that they may be on guard against the schemes of the unprincipled clique that surrounds the old President of the tottering régime.

I am of course aware of the fact that governments are considered continuous in their existence and solitary in their responsibilities, and this is no doubt the principle depended upon by the company in its present undertaking. But the company should not forget that there is another principle which in Colombia is recognized as constitutional, namely, the right of revision by a new government of the acts of its predecessors. What was illegal and void under the former can never be legal and valid under the latter. So that if the day of revision comes, as it will undoubtedly come, let not the company allege their ignorance of the true state of affairs nor bring forth expenses already incurred and payments already made.

This letter and the cablegram copied above explain what the actual state of affairs is. Later on Colombia will decide what it is best for her to do. At present it concerns the company, before disbursing their millions, to become posted regarding this important matter.

It is with regret that I have fulfilled this duty, which is not of a pleasant nature. I wish, moreover, to add that one of my constituents has already anticipated me. Dr. Focion Soto has protested from his headquarters, and as soon as that protest reaches me I shall have the honor of forwarding it to you. Dr. Alirio Diaz Guerra, authorized spokesman of the revolution in this country, has also protested through the press against the negotiations made at Bogota. I herein inclose the documents relating to the subject.

As anyone who undertakes to speak for another should produce his credentials, and as the distance does not allow me to do so in the present case, mine are at the company's disposal in Washington, D. C., at the Hotel Cochrane.

I am, dear sir, your obedient servant,

A. J. RESTREPO.

The PRESIDENT OF THE FRENCH PANAMA CANAL COMPANY, Paris, France.

CONSULAR SERVICE, UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Maraibo, April 4, 1900.

Hon. THOMAS W. CRIDLER,
Third Assistant Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CRIDLER: I take herewith the liberty to introduce to you Dr. Antonio José Restrepo of Medellin, Colombia.

Dr. Restrepo is a gentleman of high standing in his country and well known to me. He will explain the object of his visit to you personally.

Recommending Dr. Restrepo to your kind consideration, I have the honor to remain, yours, very truly,

E. H. PLUMACHER,
United States Consul.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the object of the visit of that gentleman to the United States, bearing with him copies of the protests made by the provisional government of Colombia against this canal concession, claimed now by the Panama Canal Company, was to inform our Government, so that we would not predicate our action upon such a basis as that. I suppose, Mr. President, that that was one of the reasons which induced Mr. McKinley to take action of a very decisive and very summary character as between Nicaragua and Costa Rica at a time to which I will refer presently.

I wish to introduce now, without reading them, extracts from the constitution of Colombia, printed as a document by order of the Senate, I believe, or by order of the committee, which I will insert in my remarks for the purpose of sustaining the attitude taken by the provisional government, that the concessions held and operated now by the Panama Canal Company are not valid under the constitution of Colombia.

BOGOTA, August 4, 1886.

In further support of that position, I will now read certain parts, in fact all that is in quotation marks, of an interview with Silva, former minister from Colombia to the United States, had on the 20th of March, 1902, and printed in the Commercial Advertiser of New York. I believe it is a respectable Republican paper, is it not? I think it is highly respectable. Mr. Silva was recalled as minister to this Government.

I feel authorized to state that Mr. Silva, being a great lawyer, as I understand he is—that is the information we have about him—was recalled because he held that the concession which extends this right to the Panama Canal Company from 1904 to 1910, six years, is absolutely null and void. Of course a man like that did not serve the purposes of the present Government of Colombia, because they could not raise any more money on his opinion. They were stranded if they did not get rid of Silva. They would have no chance to get a part of the $40,000,000 that we are to pay to the Panama Canal Company, of which they demand a million to be paid to them at once. How many more millions God only knows, or his Satanic Majesty, who, I think, has a good deal more to do with this business than the Almighty.

In that interview—

Señor Silva was shown a dispatch from Washington announcing that his successor, Señor José Vicente Concha, had prepared a statement which he intended to present to the State Department, in which he showed that a clear title to the Panama Canal property could be given.

"I doubt very much," said Señor Silva, "if Señor Concha's arguments will prove conclusive to the State Department. The French company itself is in doubt as to the legitimacy of its rights. In its circular, dated December 26, 1898, occurred the following."

This is from the circular of the Panama Canal Company:

"The concession of the New Panama Canal Company was granted by the Colombian Government by law dated May 28, 1878, extended by law dated December 26, 1890, and by law dated August 4, 1893. The time for the completion of the canal is thereby fixed at October, 1904"—

More than two years from now—

"but in this present month of December, 1898, the Government of Colombia has granted an additional extension of six years to 1910, subject to the formality of ratification by congress when it reconvenes."

Mr. Silva, after making that quotation, proceeds:

The congress met and repudiated this extension granted to the French company by the president of the republic; it refused to ratify the treaty signed by the executive, and adjourned. Since then there have been no sessions of congress, civil war rendering its convocation impracticable. Although in war time the power of the executive is amplified, this contingency had not been provided for, and the statutes are silent on the authority of the president to enter into such an agreement as the extension of the canal concession. Consequently this question will have to be settled before the extension of the French concession beyond 1904 is considered legal.

Besides this there is article 21 of the original contract to consider. This says:

"The concessionaires, or those who in time to come will succeed to their rights, have authority to transfer these rights to other capitalists or financial companies, but they are absolutely forbidden to surrender them or to mortgage them to a foreign government or country."

This is not all.

Says Mr. Silva:

If you read article 22 of the same contract you will see that the concessionaires not only lose their rights if at the expiration of the time allotted them for a construction of the canal the canal is not navigable, but that they also forfeit the bond of 750,000 francs furnished by them, together with the interest on that sum.

Colombia holds their bond for 750,000 francs as security that they will complete this canal. No wonder they are unhappy when they see the dismal condition in which they are placed and that this bond with its obligations is staring these men in the face as a personal and private obligation, not an obligation of a corporation that they can shake off at will and pleasure.

Article 23 specifies, further, that in case of forfeiture of rights the land granted to the concessionaires shall revert to the State, without indemnity of any kind, as well as all buildings, materials, works, and improvements. The only property which would remain in the possession of the concessionaires would be their capital, ships, provisions, and furniture.

They would be like the early Western immigrant. When he wanted to move from one habitation to another, he would rise up in the morning and take a bucket of water, put out the fire, and call his dog, and go and establish his home at another place. That is the shape they are in.

With all this you will readily see that the title which the French company is offering for sale is far from being a clear one. I have urged the drafting of a treaty at Washington between the United States and Colombia—which I believe would solve the question, but so far no official action has been taken.

The only thing we can do, Mr. President—

Instead of having a treaty between the United States and Colombia, Colombia has thrown us off to deal with a private corporation, and says "make your contract with the Panama Canal Company, not with us." I say, "No, never in the world, because when we make a contract I want somebody who can guarantee the other end of it and make it good, not a bankrupt corporation that plunges $69,000,000, at a single downfall, in order to get $40,000,000 from the Congress of the United States."

Says Mr. Silva, further:

The French minister of foreign relations has had his attention called to articles 21, 22, and 23 of the contract, so that the attempt of the French Canal Company to treat with the United States without first establishing its right to so treat is a strange proceeding, to say the least.

The honorable Senators who represent the minority of the committee say that is a perfectly legitimate act, a very natural thing to do. Mr. Silva says it appears to him to be a very strange act, and so it does to all mankind except the minority of this committee.

In my opinion the Colombian Congress will never ratify the extension of the concession of the French Canal Company to 1910. The Government, by allowing the privilege to expire in 1904, would become possessor of property valued at $40,000,000. I do not see why it should extend this privilege six years when it need not.

Dr. Restrepo—

The man whose writing has been read here this morning—

who represents the Liberals of Colombia, now in rebellion, had this to say on the same question: "The Conservatives are badly in need of money. They realize that the Liberals are becoming a greater menace every day. With the exception of Panama and Colon, we already are in possession of the whole Isthmus. The Government troops want silver for pay instead of the worthless paper money with which they are being paid. Gold is needed for the purchase of arms and ammunition and ships of war. In order to get this gold the Government has hit upon the plan of giving away something worth $40,000,000 for $1,000,000. That is what President Sanclemente got for signing the 1904-1910 extension of franchise which the Congress had refused to ratify."

The Liberals of Colombia notified the French Canal Company that this extension granted upon the sole authority of one man, in spite of the opposition of the entire congress, was not valid, and the State Department at Washington received a note of similar import. In spite of this fact the French company gave $1,000,000 for the signature of Sanclemente. To-day it is beginning to realize that the cause of the revolution will triumph, and that is the reason why it is anxious to sell out before 1904. Señor Silva was replaced probably because he would not give assurances at Washington that this 1910 extension would be legal.

The present Colombian Government is friendly to France, and is now negotiating for a loan at Paris, so it sent Señor Concha to Washington to smooth over the obstacles in the way of the sale to the United States of the French concession.

"There will be no decision in the Panama Canal matter while the revolution in Colombia is in progress. The State Department is fully aware of all the flaws in the French company's contract, and will not buy a defective title. After 1904 all doubts as to the legitimacy of the contract will have been dispelled. The Liberals will then have triumphed in Colombia and taken possession of the forfeited canal property."

I would not, Mr. President, on account of the suspicions that are always engendered in respect to these interviews, have read that independently of and separately from what I have shown officially this morning from the State Department. That interview informed me of the situation, but I did not present it to the Senate until I knew that I had safe ground to stand on. Now I have established it in a formal way, in protests that have been issued and notified to the Panama Canal Company, notified to the Colombian Government, the opposing government, notified to the United States, that the Liberal party in Colombia, now professing to have, and having, the support of the great majority of that people, will never ratify these agreements that we are bidding $40,000,000 for.

Mr. President, we might as well throw the money into the sea as to appropriate it to this broken-down company that is now speeding to its last moments of existence when it knows that this bribe to Sanclemente of a million dollars, which he paid in gold, is not going to hold good, that they can not realize anything from it, and that the Colombian people after 1904, two years from now, will repudiate the whole thing and claim the property, as they have a perfect right to do.

They commit an act of bankruptcy in falling from $109,000,000 to $40,000,000 in a proposition to sell that property. There is not a bankrupt court in the United States, nor in France, nor in the world that would sustain a sale made by an acknowledged bankrupt or by one who becomes a bankrupt and files his petition for a discharge when he claimed to hold a property worth $109,000,000 and had sold it for $40,000,000.

And yet upon technicalities our learned friends in the minority of this committee insist that that is a valid transaction and binding, not only upon Colombia but upon the clean conscience of this great and noble Republic. I repudiate it. I deny the impeachment against my country, that it is capable of entering into as questionable a contract as that.

Now, Mr. President, I have presented the points I desired to present to show that this contract is not of the value of a last year's bird's-nest. It is void, and not only void, but it is fraudulent, and the Colombian people represented by the Liberal Government repudiate it and give us notice that they intend in future to repudiate it. Are we still to persist in paying $40,000,000 to the Panama Canal Company for a contract that is thus assailed and proved to be not merely void, but fraudulent; for that is what these men charge?

Now, sir, that war is going on. It has been flagrant every day since that transaction took place and since that Congress adjourned. They did resolve before they went out that the presidency was vacant, and thereupon the president of the provisional government assumed that he was in lawful authority. From that day to this he has so contended. He has had his armies in the field and fought heavy battles, in which there have been great losses on both sides.

This controversy in a minor way represents, not in principle, but in the action of the people concerned, that great and terrific controversy in which we were concerned in 1861–1865. They fight with desperate determination, and they are at it to-day. The latest accounts in the newspapers, by telegraph, on yesterday were that the Government, or the Conservatives, as they are called, were attacking the Liberals, who are fortified in Panama, and that those outside the walls had 7,000 troops and those inside the walls had about 4,000. There are ten or twelve thousand men to-day engaged in battle originating out of these unlawful acts, about which we are quietly legislating, with a view of paying a company that have got up the row $40,000,000 for their interference. That is the situation to-day.

There is another fact connected with that war which I want to call to the attention of the American people. I have the honor of being listened to by a faithful and splendid Democrat, almost the only one who is here. The Senate is not my audience. I wish it distinctly understood that I am speaking to the American people, and through them I will speak to the Senate.

I have presented now these facts, but I want to connect another one with it as another cause of the war. Why are these men called Liberals and Conservatives? It is an old political division, commencing on the first outbreak after the revolution in Mexico, and it has followed all the Spanish-American States after their first organization. The revolutions in those different Governments found the bonds of church and state irrevocable in all these Spanish provinces, and they revolted at that. Mexico in consequence of it had 52 presidents in fifty years, and Panama has had about that number of governors in sixty years. There are few States, if any, exempt; perhaps Chile and perhaps Argentina. There are few States, if any, in South America or in North America or in Central America that have escaped this same conflict that is raging to-day in Colombia. The division of parties is the Liberal and the church party, or Conservatives.

I read to the Senate the other day a paper from Pope Leo XIII, a corcordat made with Colombia in 1888. It is in the RECORD here. It is established as a part of the fundamental government of that Republic, not an established church; Leo would not have it that way; but an independent church represented by the Holy See and negotiating in its political capacity with Colombia as an independent Republic. The two governments came to an agreement and made a compact, which is set forth in that concordat.

The establishment of that concordat so long after Panama and Colombia had their struggles to maintain independence was a serious blow at the liberal party in that country. They felt that the liberties for which they had actually been fighting for years and years were to be blotted out by the concordat. There it is in its hideous monstrosity, which permits a man and a woman who are duly married according to the laws of the United States and who have gone to Colombia, either of them, to marry some other person without any judicial decree of separation, if that marriage between them was not celebrated by the authority of the Catholic church; and if the poor woman, for instance, was deserted in this way and the man married another woman in accordance with the rites of the Catholic Church, the only concession to be made at all was that the issue by her should be considered to be legitimate, and he should take care of them until she married again in accordance with the rules of the church.

When you come to education the public schools are not only under the patronage but under the control of the priesthood, and the bishop of each district fixes all the schoolbooks, secular and ecclesiastical.

Not only so, but the Government is pledged that if any man makes a lecture or writes an article or utters an opinion contrary to the tenets of the established church or of the independent church connected with Colombia by the concordat he is liable to criminal punishment, and the Government is bound to punish him and engages to do it. Not only so, but there is a provision that the annual budget shall contain a certain large amount—in one instance it mentions a hundred thousand dollars a year—for the purpose of maintaining the church in that country.

Now, I am presenting these facts to the American people. I do not care what the Senators think about them, but I know the people will take note of it. I know the people of the United States do not want to go to Colombia under a contract which sustains the majesty and superiority of the laws of that State over a canal bill where honorable men, though they may be workmen, may desire to go and conduct their business, or some man may desire to go there and stay for the purpose of maintaining a little shop to make some money for his wife and children. I know that our people are not going to consent, for the purpose of getting a canal, to pay $40,000,000 for the opportunity of placing themselves beneath the yoke of that concordat.

The people will make points upon Senators on either side of this Chamber who undertake to put them and their affairs in that category by an expenditure of $40,000,000 and then deal with a corporation that is denounced by the liberal party, now in arms and fighting around Panama, as being absolutely and unquestionably violative of the constitution of Colombia of 1886.

That is as far as I care to go, Mr. President, in the presentation of that question. So in the very threshold of this legislation we are met by a company that is denounced by more than half of Colombia as a fraud and an outrage and as a conspirator in favor of the church party and against liberal government. Whether it is true or not, what difference does it make? It shows the state of feeling there.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Suppose the Liberals win?

Mr. MORGAN. They say if they win they regard all these concessions as being void.

Mr. SPOONER. If they win and in season do not ratify a treaty, this bill provides for the Nicaragua Canal?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, Mr. President; but I have rights that belong to me as an American citizen and I do not wish to be compelled to make some disreputable contract with some party in order to get them. I do not think that is a good protocol or frontispiece for our legislation. We are a free people yet, and unless we are bound by some ties that I am unconscious of, we are not bound take this contract, and if it turns out to be a bad one, then claim that we have got a hold on the good one, because we have got the Nicaragua route; but you have not.

Mr. McKinley made a contract with those people dependent on the fact that Congress would authorize him to acquire that territory from them. If Congress, instead of doing that, authorizes the President to acquire the territory from Colombia, and finds that it can not do it because of the endangered situation of the Panama Canal Company, because of its unconstitutional exaction; if you can not get a title, then when you turn to Costa Rica and Nicaragua they will say, "Excuse us; you would have no dealings with us. You refused to accept the protocol of McKinley. When you found out you could not get a contract with Colombia you wish to stand upon it now. We agreed to make terms with you and you would not do it." That is the situation. By providing that the Government shall first deal with Colombia we throw away all the advantages and rights that Mr. KcKinley put it in our power to acquire from Nicaragua and Costa Rica.

You tie our hands by trying to hunt out and arrange an agreement with Colombia, which at once it is seen we can not make. So when I present questions of this kind to the honorable Senate, I feel that they must realize that there can not be any sound, practical basis for this project or contrivance at all. It must be for delay; I suggest that it can not be for anything else. I am making no question about motives, but I have a right to differ in opinion with others as to the effect of our conduct, and I say that to make this bargain with Colombia under these conditions is inevitably to delay the canal not only in Colombia, but also in Costa Rica and Nicaragua indefinitely, and to put ourselves absolutely in the power of those two Republics, unless we take an army and go down there and drive them out. That is the only alternative presented to us.

There never was a more mistaken piece of legislation than this, and I say that my friend from Wisconsin can not amend it so as to make it right. I know he is not going to insist upon the amendment that has been offered here in his name. I know perfectly well that it has to be modified and has to be reduced in its scope to meet the offer of the church party in Colombia.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me, as he uses my name and says that I will not offer the amendment, does he mean that I am not the author of it?

Mr. MORGAN. I am satisfied the Senator wrote it.

Mr. SPOONER. And the Senator was the author of it.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course.

Mr. SPOONER. And not only wrote it, but devised it.

Mr. MORGAN. But the Senator did not offer it and has not offered it in the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. But the Senator will offer it.

Mr. MORGAN. I say it has not been offered here by the Senator from Wisconsin, but it has been offered by the minority of the committee who reported it. They want it in one shape; and I suppose when the Senator from Wisconsin comes to put it in the shape to suit himself, after due deliberation, he will put it in in a different shape. So you would have two amendments here. One that the minority of the committee have committed themselves solemnly to in their written report, in which they incorporate the amendment and all the terms it contains. The other is to come.

Mr. SPOONER. I will say to the Senator that in the amendment which I shall offer there will not be any essential change.

Mr. MORGAN. If I could see that—I have been for several days anxiously trying to see it, but it has not been convenient to the Senator to offer it to me—I could form some judgment of my own about it; and I propose to discuss it in the best light I have, and that is entirely by guess. The ingenuity of the Senator from Wisconsin has, I suppose, framed that amendment after all so as to make it harmonious with the proposed treaty with Colombia. That is the way in which I shall have to treat it.

Mr. SPOONER. I will say to the Senator that the amendment which I intend to offer will be an amendment which will conform to the precise terms of the treaty with Colombia.

Mr. MORGAN. If I could just see that I would know what it meant.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will know when I have the time to draw it.

Mr. MORGAN. That is a very general statement.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will see it as soon as I have an opportunity to prepare it.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, it must be a piece of very intricate work to take so long to complete it.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not so situated that I have nothing else to do except to attend to this canal.

Mr. MORGAN. Neither am I. I have a world of work around me, and I try to do it all.

I am obliged, Mr. President, now to say this about the subject: The Senator assures me that he wants to modify the amendment so as not to make specific, as I understand it, the demand we make of Colombia as the condition of making this forty-million-dollar trade. I want it specific. Before that forty-million-dollar trade came to light and into view they were specific. There was a breath almost of heroism in the amendment that the Senator from Wisconsin offered at that time, demanding perpetual and exclusive rights under the control of the United States in that canal. That accords exactly with our policy; that accords with the policy of the bill before the Senate; that accords with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which we discussed here so long, and it accords with the policy announced by various Presidents, beginning with General Grant.

General Grant first made the proclamation of that policy, as I will presently show. This heroic amendment is now being emasculated and has to undergo some surgical treatment, clipping off in one place or another, so as to reduce it down and squeeze it into the provisions of this corporate charter of the Panama Canal Company or of this convention that has been offered by Colombia. Colombia never had anything really to do with it. It was offered by a pretended government there that is staggering on its last feet, and which before the sun sets may be wiped out of existence by defeat at Panama. That is where we are, and all this, Mr. President, to enable us to get a little more breath until we can rise to the magnitude of the occasion and get our consent to accommodate and oblige the American people by doing their will with the money that they pay into their Treasury.

In his address delivered on the 5th and 6th days of the present month the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] said:

> It is only very recently that the opportunity has come to us to consider other routes.

For the purpose of giving a little more emphasis to that, I will read it again:

> It is only very recently that the opportunity has come to us to consider other routes. For years we talked and wrote about the Nicaragua Canal until it has become a sentiment. It seemed to be the only route across the Isthmus available to this country or to its citizens for the construction of a canal.
> Mr. President, I say we have dwelt upon the question of the Nicaragua Canal as a sentiment until we have grown to believe that there was no other route possible or available. Two years ago, when this thought seemed to be forced upon the people of this country with more than unusual interest, owing to the late war with Spain, when the passage of the famous war ship, the Oregon, from San Francisco to Cuba called the attention of the world to a feat which had never been equaled by any other vessel, it was an advertisement for our Navy, but at the same time it was an object lesson; and with our fleets divided and scattered broadcast over the world we seemed to be forced as a military necessity to the conclusion that a canal must be built.

Well, that was a heavy pressure, and I was in hopes it would win, but it has not as yet, and will not so long as the railroads can prevent it—never.

The voyage of the Oregon, which stands by itself in naval history as the most intrepid and the most wisely conducted of all naval expeditions, began from San Francisco on March 9, 1898, and ended at Jupiter Inlet, Florida, May 24—sixty-one days of anxiety, as keen and distressing as a great nation ever felt.

I wonder, Mr. President, if the supposed, not real, possibility of saving to the United States $5,000,000 by a questionable bargain with a disreputable company will induce the Senate to make this national peril and anxiety again possible.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator permit me to offer an amendment at this point?

Mr. MORGAN. An amendment to the pending bill?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. An amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. MORGAN. Let it be read. I thought the Senator in addressing the Senate yesterday had no amendment to make.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I offer it as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, I want it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert in the amendment of Mr. SPOONER, as section 7, the following:

> SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States from time to time as the proceeds may be required to defray expenditures authorized by this act (such proceeds when received to be used only for the purpose of meeting such expenditures) the sum of $130,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and to prepare and issue therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe and in denominations of $20 or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in gold coin at the pleasure of the United States after ten years from the date of their issue and payable twenty years from such date, and bearing interest, payable quarterly in gold coin, at the rate of 2 per cent per annum; and the bonds herein authorized shall be exempt from all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.
> Provided, That said bonds may be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury at not less than par, under such regulations as he may prescribe, but no commissions shall be allowed or paid thereon; and a sum not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of the bonds herein authorized is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to pay the expense of preparing, advertising, and issuing the same: And provided further, That none of the said bonds shall be sold to pay the sums appropriated in sections 1 and 2 of this act or to pay the sum of $10,000,000 appropriated in section 5 of this act.

Mr. MORGAN. That means, if I understand it, that so far as the $40,000,000 are concerned, they must be paid to France in gold.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. That is appropriated out of revenue now in the Treasury.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand. That means gold.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Yes, gold. This proposed amendment provides for the difference between the present cash payments and the estimated cost of the canal.

Mr. MORGAN. I understand. That is, the $40,000,000 must be paid in gold, because the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who sits on the right of the Senator from Indiana, would never admit that a payment out of the Treasury of the United States should ever be anything but a payment in gold.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. We are on a gold basis.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; we are on a gold basis as to the Panama Canal to the extent of $40,000,000. We are on a gold basis as to that, and on a gold basis also as to the $10,000,000 that is appropriated here for the purpose of acquiring the concession from Colombia. Very well, we have got to a gold basis about that, because they need money there very badly, and if you want to get a bargain out of them, this is the time to do it, and they will not have anything but gold.

That is evidenced by the remonstrance which I have read this morning. But when you come to the balance of it, you must build the canal by the issuance of bonds. I am very averse to issuing any more bonds, particularly when we have in the Treasury a plethora of money. I can see no reason in the world for resorting to raising money by the issuance of bonds in this bill, except to delay or defeat the canal. It can not be for anything else. It would have that effect.

I remember when Mr. Bryan was a member of the other House, a gentleman for whom I have the highest respect and in whose judgment and in whose honor and patriotism I have the most perfect confidence. He introduced a bill there to build the Nicaragua Canal, and he proposed to raise the money to build it by the issue of greenbacks. I believe it was a direct proposition to build the canal by the Government. At all events, the money was to be raised by the issue of greenbacks. He came to me with the proposition, and we went to the Marble Room and had a conference about it.

I said to Mr. Bryan "If you can not get nearer to the subject of a canal than that, do not expect me to support the bill. I can not do it. I will not do what I conceive to be an unconstitutional thing even for the purpose of getting a canal." I believe the issue of greenbacks as a legal tender is unconstitutional when it is made for any other purpose than that nest of facts and circumstances that the Supreme Court gathered together in order to enable it to decide that the issue of greenbacks was constitutional as a war measure.

Now, the Senator from Indiana will understand that I must break away from him on this proposition, having broken away from a very dear political friend for a less reason than he furnishes. But why any American citizen should want now to engage in anything that requires the issue of bonds when we have got a Treasury that is overflowing with money, and we do not know what to do with it, I can not understand, unless the Senator proposes by putting on this æolian attachment to this affair he will be able to defeat the whole thing. I am afraid the Senator has some delight in the expectation.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I regret that my honorable friend from Alabama so misunderstands the purpose of the amendment. It is a very reasonable and natural provision for an extraordinary expenditure which must be made. I shall offer it to the Senator's bill if, unfortunately, the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] should not be adopted by the Senate.

One objection to the Senator's bill is, I think, that he requires the entire cost of the canal by the Nicaragua route, some $180,000,000, to be paid out of the current revenues of the Government. The canal when built will stand for centuries; and I believe it is proper conservatism, I believe it is the wisest statesmanship, to distribute that burden over a reasonable period in the future, instead of imposing it entirely and absolutely upon the taxpayers as the work progresses.

Mr. MORGAN. They expect the canal to make money. The Suez Canal is making 18 per cent on an investment of $150,000,000, and we expect this canal to make money. So far as posterity is concerned, we think we will give them very large percentages of gain from the canal itself; but if we do not we will do a better thing than that for them, we will relieve them from the monopoly of the railroads in charging them unconscionable rates upon their productions, and we will go further than that, we will reduce the canal tolls upon this canal to such an extent and in such a way as that these people will enjoy the advantage of it, and not the officeholders or the men who manage these great concerns.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask the Senator if the commerce of other countries will not pass through this canal?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes; and we will charge them on that.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Is it not proper that the tolls derived from that canal should go toward paying the expense incurred in building the canal?

Mr. MORGAN. Of course; and that will enable us to reduce the tolls.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Alabama to say that we intend to charge tolls on the canal. For information, I want to ask the Senator if it is not true that we have entered into a treaty which obligates us to allow all the nations of the world to use that canal on precisely the same terms and at the same charges that we do?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MORGAN. I do.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator state what route he refers to as being covered by such treaty provision as that of which the Senator speaks?

Mr. BAILEY. I was directing my question to the Senator from Alabama as to the Nicaragua route.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Oh, as to the Nicaragua route.

Mr. BAILEY. As to the treaty with Great Britain, I am not sure that it is confined to any specific route. I think it is as to an isthmian canal. My judgment is that we obligated ourselves in that treaty that all the nations of the world observing its terms should use it on precisely the same terms and conditions as we. I remember that was one of the grounds upon which I voted against the treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. I will assume that that is so, yet I do not believe it; but for the sake of the argument, I will assume that it is so, and give the Senator the full benefit of it. Still, what is to prevent the United States, after it has built this canal, from reducing the tolls to a rate that will be a mere figment upon our coastwise trade, or upon any trade that passes through the canal? When we improve rivers and harbors, as we do by the expenditure of many millions annually, we do not propose to recoup ourselves by charging tolls on our rivers and harbors.

Mr. BAILEY. That was not the point of my question. I understood the Senator from Alabama to say that we were going to give our people the full enjoyment of these low rates and we were going to charge on foreign commerce.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I did not say that.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I misunderstood the Senator, because I ventured to make that suggestion. I think we voted to make the votes on the treaty public, and I remember distinctly that one of the grounds upon which I voted against the ratification of that treaty was that after we had built the canal at our expense and taken upon ourselves its defense we then guaranteed to all other nations its use upon the same terms with ourselves.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, if the Congress of the United States ever builds a canal across the American Isthmus that is free from all possible question which may arise here; if we ever get an act of that sort—we will be certainly wiser than we have ever been in any act of Congress I have ever seen enacted as yet.

The Senator from Texas spoke as if I were stating what I would do. Mr. President, I will be in my grave, perhaps, before a mile of this canal is constructed. I think very likely I will.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not mean the Senator from Alabama. I said "we," meaning the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not the United States—far from it.

Mr. BAILEY. I am perfectly aware of that.

Mr. MORGAN. I am on the minority side and in very deep gloom, so far as that is concerned, and likely to remain so if Democrats continue to raise these slight objections against this canal.

Mr. BAILEY. I protest against the Senator from Alabama saying that I am raising any point against him. I simply understood him to make a statement that did not square with my understanding of an existing treaty. The Senator from Alabama ought not to assume that everybody that comes to him for information, knowing his great resources, is opposed to his bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Not by any means. I had in mind some amendments that have been offered here by other Senators when I made that remark. If my remark is offensive to the Senator from Texas, I withdraw it as to him.

If we choose to do so, after we have made this treaty of which the Senator speaks, giving to it the fullest effect that is claimed for it by anybody, can we not rebate in favor of American commerce? Can we not pay it back to our coastwise trade and those steamships or sailing ships according to their tonnage, as we do in a subsidy bill? Can we not do that? We are under no restraint about this thing that is going to prevent us from taking care of our own people. We are not going to get into any such loop as that.

The Senator from Indiana speaks of this as "my bill." Why, Mr. President, it is the bill of a member from Iowa in the other House [Mr. HEPBURN]. He is entitled to the honor of it. Twice it has passed in his name. It comes from a Republican House to a Republican Senate, and I just happen to be by the courtesy of the Senate the chairman of this committee, because it was one of those placebos thrown out to the minority here to keep them in a good humor with themselves and all the world. That is the only way I happen to be connected with it. So if there is anybody who has less responsibility about it than I have, I do not know who he is.

Mr. HOAR. I am very desirous of introducing a joint resolution for the purpose of having it referred to a committee this afternoon, if it will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. This is the first time I have had the honor of seeing the Senator on the floor this morning, and I must yield to him.

Mr. HOAR. I was about to rise independent of that.

[The joint resolution introduced by Mr. HOAR appears under the appropriate heading.]

Mr. HOAR. I was about rising, if the Senator will pardon me, as he made an allusion to me of not having seen me before today, to say that he is utterly mistaken if he thinks his assignment to the chairmanship of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals was moved by a desire merely to give a placebo, as he called it, to the Democratic party. The Republican side of the Senate assigned him to that position because they believed him to be one of the greatest living Senators and one of the greatest authorities on one of the greatest subjects with which we have to deal, and, therefore, without any regard to party, we were all delighted to ask him to assume that dignified and honorable post.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, Mr. President, if I have the honor of being the distinguished personage spoken of by the Senator from Massachusetts, one of the greatest of living Senators, I will soon be one of the greatest of dead ones if they do not take off from me some of the burdens which this question puts upon me, and unless that side of the Chamber will make some movement to honor the memory of William McKinley. He is the man who is more responsible for this than I am. There is another man more responsible still, and that is General Grant, the first man who ever inspired me with the idea that such a thing could be done, and I will show it presently.

It was his confidence in the Nicaragua route that was the first lodgment of my faith, and his assurance that the American people would open the canal there that gave wing to bright hopes that I can not abandon. The Fifty-sixth Congress, and again in the Fifty-seventh, the House has asked the Senate to concur in a measure that would prevent the recurrence of this fearful national exposure to dangers of extreme magnitude, such as the Oregon encountered. In the Fifty-sixth Congress the Senate sheltered itself behind a cloud of doubt as to the alleged right of Great Britain to prevent the United States from constructing a canal anywhere across the American Isthmus in virtue of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Great Britain had never, in fact, asserted such a right as a practical question, and while the opponents of such a canal were conducting this tempest of false alarms, Great Britain was respectfully but not severely silent.

She was amused at the false alarm and was satisfied with the delay it occasioned in the opening of a canal which was to be the competitor of the Suez Canal.

She had a large investment in the Suez Canal, which yields a dividend of about 18 per cent per annum, besides a value of near 800 per cent profit on her investment, at the current rate, on the Paris Bourse and the London Stock Exchange.

She had an army in Egypt and a fortress at the island of Cyprus that commanded the northern mouth of the Suez Canal at Port Said, and another at Aden that commanded the approach to the southern mouth at Suez, through the Red Sea.

She had no occasion to make any actual assertion of her alleged rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, because they were asserted in the Senate, with alarmed vehemence, by the opponents of any isthmian canal.

In this way such a palsy of fear crept over the Senate that Great Britain had no need to dread its intervention, and it remained at repose in haughty indifference while it contemplated with satisfaction the bickerings in which we were engaged as to the character and extent of her rights in the premises. While this was going on, a quiet, unpretentious event occurred in the Executive Mansion, on December 1, 1900, which satisfied Great Britain that the hour had struck in which the United States would assert its independence of the supposed thralldom of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

President McKinley, in the firm quietude of a fixed purpose, saw that the United States could not shake off the incubus of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty so long as it was convenient for the interests of Great Britain and profitable to the monopolists of American transportation between the great oceans that the spook of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should be kept at work. He had to convince Great Britain that he, at least, was in earnest, and that he firmly and quietly repudiated the right of Great Britain to deny to us the sovereign right to make a contract with Costa Rica and Nicaragua for the exclusive right to build, own, control, and manage a canal between Greytown and Brito, through the San Juan Valley and Lake Nicaragua.

He entered into such a contract with each of those States, in writing and under seal, of which each State retained identical copies.

It is called a protocol, because a part of the contracts relating to future agreements is left open for future negotiations relating to arrangements for their final completion. The leading and substantial parts of these contracts take effect forthwith, without any sort of dependence upon further negotiation or agreement.

They depend on nothing for their complete validity and binding effect except the action of Congress authorizing the President to acquire the rights therein specified, which are described in the language employed in the first sections of the House bill now before the Senate. This language was copied from the Hepburn bill, which was then pending in the House of Representatives, and was soon afterwards passed in that body.

The rights so described in that measure and in these agreements are the foundation or basic rights upon which Mr. McKinley established by agreenment with those States that, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to the contrary notwithstanding, the United States would, at her pleasure and convenience, construct and exclvsively own, control, operate, and manage a canal through the isthmus, along the Nicaraguan route. The agreements were made to take effect, not upon the specific approval of them by act of Congress, but when Congress should authorize the President to acquire such rights from Nicaragua and Costa Rica.

No money consideration, or other consideration, was named in these agreements.

None was needed to support the validity and obligation of the agreement, for two reasons—first, that a valuable consideration is never made to support contracts or agreements between sovereign powers; and, second, because the action of Congress in granting the power to the President to acquire such rights from these particular States would be a valid, sufficient, and lawful consideration to bind even private persons to the performance of the contract.

So these agreements were of perfect obligation and of immediate effect, whenever Congress, within a reasonable time, shall authorize the President to acquire the rights specifically described in them.

In the former reports of the Committee on Nicaragua Canals, and the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and in remarks I have had the honor to deliver in the Senate the further effect and bearing of these agreements have been so fully discussed that I will not now take up those features of their provisions.

What I am now concerned in bringing to the attention of the Senate is the fact that Mr. McKinley defied and scouted the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in the act of making these agreements, and thereby, in his quiet way, informed Great Britain of the final stand he had taken as Chief Executive of the United States as to the supposed restrictions of that treaty upon our sovereign rights and duties.

In doing this, and in withholding the official announcement of these agreements to Congress, he made it easy for Great Britain to agree, in the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is abrogated.

These agreements won the entire campaign that the transportation monopolists were waging against the United States under the British flag. Can it be truly asserted that when Mr. McKinley made these agreements he made no selection of routes as between Panama and Nicaragua?

It can not be truly asserted. On the contrary, such a statement is palpably misleading.

On the 30th of November, 1900, the Isthmian Canal Commission made their preliminary report to the President, in which they say:

CONCLUSION.

In view of all the facts, and particularly in view of all the difficulties of obtaining the necessary rights, privileges, and franchises on the Panama route—

Notice, if you please—and assuming that Nicaragua and Costa Rica recognize the value of the canal to themselves and are prepared to grant concessions on terms which are reasonable and acceptable to the United States, the Commission is of the opinion that "the most practicable and feasible route for" an isthmian canal to be "under the control, management, and ownership of the United States" is that known as the Nicaragua route.

We have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servants,

J. G. WALKER,
Rear-Admiral, United States Navy,
President of the Commission.
SAMUEL PASCO.
ALFRED NOBLE.
GEO. S. MORISON.
PETER C. HAINS,
Colonel, United States Corps of Engineers.
WM. H. BURR.
O. H. ERNST,
Lieutenant-Colonel, United States Corps of Engineers.
LEWIS M. HAUPT.
EMORY R. JOHNSON.

The date of that was the 30th of November, 1900. Mark the date, for it closed the era of British domination over American isthmian canal routes through the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It was the date of the removal of the mask that screened from observation the real purpose of the transportation monopolists who were then concealing their opposition to any canal behind this pretense of British supremacy and British treaty rights.

This preliminary report does not differ from the final report of that Commission in any fact stated nor in any conclusion reached in their final report, made one year later, except that the final report is evidently a conglomerate composed by several minds and collated into a somewhat enlarged and much confused volume, and is by no means so clear as the preliminary report.

Mr. McKinley knew months before that time what that report would be in all its essential features from the exhaustive statements of all the commissioners, made before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals in May, 1900.

Those statements have been printed and reported to the Senate, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] being a member of the committee and present at the examinations.

I need not say that he was the near friend of the President. So, at once, on the next day after this preliminary report was submitted to him, Mr. McKinley took final, decisive, and irrevocable action on two vital questions.

He chose the Nicaraguan route for the canal, and agreed to acquire the same from the two sovereign Republics, Nicaragua and Costa Rica, if Congress would authorize him to do so, and he took ground as to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that it formed no impediment to building a canal, of which the United States should be the sole owner, exclusive of Great Britain and all other countries except Costa Rica and Nicaragua.

In the pressure of all the numerous and vast questions that then presented the more difficult and dangerous problems for his solution this great and patriotic American statesman seized the occasion and the opportune moment to put it in the power of Congress, not of the Senate alone, to fix the location of the canal on the Nicaraguan route, to acquire the broadest concessions for its ownership and control there that we could ask, short of full sovereignty over the canal route, and to notify Great Britain and those masquerading as her champions that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had become a dead letter.

That was the effect of these protocols, as they are called. That is why they were made.

That great man did not allow a day to elapse after the preliminary report of the Commission was made until he had signed with these two Republics agreements that would bind them to give to us rights that he discovered from that report and from his own observations could not be exerted in Panama without very great risk in many directions if they could be obtained.

He repudiated Panama then, and he adopted Nicaragua then. He combined both of these final results in one act, and at the same time he quietly admonished Great Britain that the President of the United States would sign a binding agreement with these two Republics to have exclusive privileges in this Isthmus for a canal and perpetual privileges there, notwithstanding any interruption that she might seek to impose by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Whatever feeling of disrespect the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] may have for the ignorance or indifference to duty of the House of Representatives, I suppose he must respect one of the most heroic acts ever performed by a President, Mr. McKinley's great work of settling this canal question. He is gone, but, as it is said of the righteous dead, "His works do follow him."

When he went the prowlers returned to their prey, but they will not succeed in undoing what he has so well done, for it is also said of the works of the righteous man that "they abide forever."

I was very proud, as I have no doubt the Senator from Ohio was, in that period of peaceful confidence in which the House of Representatives was considering the second Hepburn bill, upon the final report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, to join the entire committee in the following just tribute to President McKinley for the work he had done in getting these concessions.

The committee say, in their reports:

The trade winds find their natural channel through the depression of the lakes and the valley of San Juan River, and keep that region free from the pestilence that has its breeding ground at Panama.

The foundations of assured success in the opening of the Nicaraguan Canal have been established in recent events.

In those events William McKinley marched with the American people, at the head of the column, and they marched abreast in the high calling that their fathers had pursued in claiming for themselves the right to rule, in government, according to law.

He led where the people directed, and he laid secure foundations, for the first time, for direct communication between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of America and between the East and the West Indies.

Holding in patient and just equipoise the great question that has so long disturbed our counsels and has threatened the peace of the country, he has exhausted inquiry and examination through the scientific skill of corps of great engineers, and his judgment settled upon the conclusion that he reached and formulated in the agreements of December, 1900, with Nicaragua and Costa Rica, that require only the action of Congress to complete his last great labor for his country.

Its completion should have been among the greatest of the achievements of the American people in the nineteenth century and the crowning honor of the Administration of William McKinley, for which his desire was so earnest.

In his farewell address to the American people, intended as a greeting but ended by the hand of Providence as a testamentary plea for the peace, prosperity, and glory of his country, President McKinley appealed to the whole country to execute in good faith what he had agreed upon in like good faith, in December, 1900, with Costa Rica and Nicaragua.

When he made that agreement with these twoAmerican sister Republics to "acquire from them control of such portion of the territory now belonging to them as may be desirable and necessary on which to construct and protect a canal," he intended to keep it, unless Congress should deny him the authority to acquire it. It was to that agreement that he referred in his address at Buffalo, when he announced his Presidential policy, and recognized the opening of an isthmian canal as an imperative national duty, and proclaimed as his final injunction that "We must build the isthmian canal, which will unite the two oceans and give a straight line of communication with the western coasts of Central and South Americas and Mexico."

The American people will crown his great memory with a prompt response to his latest admonition.

He did not find the opportunity to close this last link in the chain of great achievements that would bring the East and the West Indies into close touch, with the banners of the liberty of self-government above them, planted by the people who first raised them above this great Republic.

Mr. President, it is a desecration to the memory of that great statesman and good man to say that in making these solemn agreements with Nicaragua and Costa Rica in 1900 he was performing either an act of perfidy or an act that he believed amounted to nothing. There has not been in the whole history of the diplomacy of the United States a more important contract than that, or one made under circumstances of greater solemnity.

It was one to make which Mr. McKinley caught the very moment, the next day after the preliminary report of the Isthmian Canal Commission had been made, and having made that agreement on the next day he sat down in quiet, satisfied that he had done his whole duty by his country, and that he had quietly and in a proper way admonished Great Britain that there was nothing in her case that could terrify or stop him or the American people under his leadership.

From that time forward there was but one thought in his mind, so far as that question is concerned, and that was that he had before him a report, not one report, but many reports, which satisfied his mind that he had made a correct choice in selecting Costa Rica and Nicaragua with whom to make the contract; that he had made it, and that if the Congress of the United States would confer upon him the power the balance of it was already accomplished.

There would be no question of the jurisdiction of the Senate as compared with the jurisdiction of the House left for discussion if Congress would give him the authority he asked. He left it with Congress as to whether or not it would authorize him to make the agreement. In both of those agreements he quoted the very language of the Hepburn bill—the identical language—which bill was then pending in the House of Representatives, in order that the action of the Executive Government might correspond with the recommendation of the House committee; and that measure finally passed into an act of Congress, so far as the House was concerned.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Did President McKinley ever send any of these agreements to the Senate or the Congress for their action?

Mr. MORGAN. He never did. I have explained the reason why he did not.

Mr. SPOONER. Why did he not?

Mr. MORGAN. I have just said, because he did not want to create in the mind of Great Britain the idea that he was breaking down, without proper diplomatic consideration, the relations that were claimed to be held between them. He made his agreement. He kept it in the archives of the State Department. He communicated to his friends the knowledge that the agreement had been made. His Secretary of State authorized me to present it to the Senate in one of its executive sessions.

But Mr. McKinley, with that sort of poise which belonged to him to a degree as great if not greater than any man I ever saw, knew that if he thrust out that agreement as an Executive declaration of a consummated act, so far as the Executive was concerned, through a message to the Congress of the United States, Great Britain would take it as a declaration on the part of the Executive that law would be employed to abrogate the treaty at a time when Great Britain herself was willing to do it by diplomatic means, as she has, more than once, offered to do.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will pardon me, at the time the protocol was entered into Great Britain had entered into the Hay-Pauncefote agreement and it was pending before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. As a matter of course it was pending before the Senate. Mr. Hay at that time, I have no doubt—I can not speak for him, of course—did not wish to influence the independent action of the Senate by showing that the Executive had already taken ground. So he held it back. Do you suppose he kept it back for the purpose of smothering it after it was made and a copy of it had been delivered into the hands of Nicaragua and Costa Rica? Was that like William McKinley?

Mr. SPOONER. The Secretary of State—exactly why he did it I do not know—sent it to the Senator from Alabama, who was chairman of the Isthmian Canal Committee or the Nicaragua Canal Committee or whatever the name of the committee was at that time. But that is a new way for a compact or proposed compact between this Government and another to get to the Senate or to the Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. It was not a proposed compact. An act of Congress had to be passed to make it a compact. Mr. McKinley did not undertake to decide it. He decided it, so far as he was concerned, but he asked still the power of Congress to enable him to do it. That was all.

Mr. SPOONER. He did not send it to Congress; he made no recommendation to Congress; he sent no message to Congress, and the only information that Congress ever had of the existence of the protocols was through the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. Until the last report of the Isthmian Canal Commission, when Mr. Hay communicated it to us officially. It is now officially before the Congress. There is no longer a Hay-Pauncefote question to be disturbed by it. There is now no public exigency that might occur to endanger the country by the presentation of the fact. So he presents it officially to the Congress, and Costa Rica and Nicaragua both officially insist that it is obligatory. When Mr. McKinley selected the language of the Hepburn bill in which to couch those agreements and that bill was pending in the House, he had an expectation that that bill would pass, and he had a right to expect it.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The protocol was an agreement to negotiate a treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. It was more than that, by a good deal.

Mr. SPOONER. How much more than that?

Mr. MORGAN. It was an agreement which took effect forthwith, whenever Congress should authorize the President to acquire this territorial control, to the extent of naming the termini of the canal, the country through which it should pass, and the exclusive and perpetual right to build, own, and control a canal, on the terms that were described in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, making the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by reference the true expression of a provision of it.

The fixed provisions of the treaty were such as I have mentioned. Then there was an additional agreement that the countries concerned would enter upon future negotiations and arrange further details for the execution of the great purposes contained in this fixed agreement. That is the situation.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course the protocol provided that when the President was authorized to do so and so, these countries would enter into negotiations for a treaty, as I recollect it.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Wisconsin evidently has not read the protocol, or else he has misunderstood it.

Mr. SPOONER. I have read it.

Mr. MORGAN. It is called a protocol because of the postponement of a part of it for future negotiation.

Mr. SPOONER. I call it a protocol because I have heard the Senator call it that a good many times.

Mr. MORGAN. It is called a protocol in the official account of it. It is a protocol to an agreement. That is what it is. A part of the document is a concluded agreement. Another and subsidiary part is an agreement or protocol for further negotiations, to perfect, in detail, the concluded agreements specified therein.

Mr. SPOONER. The point to which I rose is this: Since then Nicaragua has proposed a treaty with the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. No; only in execution of what is called a protocol. She offers to treat, as she agreed to do, to complete the concluded agreement,

Mr. SPOONER. A tentative treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. She has sent us a draft of a treaty, stating the proposition she is willing to make as to the arrangements necessary to execute it.

Mr. SPOONER. That is a merger pro tanto of the protocol.

Mr. MORGAN. It only makes it stronger. It certainly does not weaken it.

Mr. SPOONER. A thing that is merged in a solemn document ceases to exist in itself.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. It is difficult to keep up with the refinements of my bright friend the Senator from Wisconsin on law questions. There is not a man in the world who can ask such bright questions that no one can answer, not even himself.

Mr. SPOONER. That is polite, but I will be more polite and will ask the Senator's pardon for interrupting him.

Mr. MORGAN. I will take that back, although it is just.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think it is just.

Mr. MORGAN. I will state it again, as I have the interest of some Senators fixed on this great act of Mr. McKinley. I am not his champion. I wish there were some great Democrat for whom I had so much respect. I am not his champion or his exponent, but I have an eye upon his conduct that I think is not overzealous to do him justice or to work praise in his favor, but that does not respect the magnificence of his genius in the control of governments. I call attention to it again, as the Senators—some of them—are disposed even to listen to me while I speak.

That agreement made by Mr. McKinley contained two distinct features. The first was a contract to take effect forthwith. That is the language of it. The next was a contract to make a treaty to carry into execution the plan and arrangement necessary to complete the building of a canal. The first contract secured to us the route, the termini, the perpetual and the exclusive right to build the canal and to control and manage it. That took place without one dollar of consideration. No consideration was mentioned, except that the Congress of the United States would authorize the President to make such an agreement, not a specific one, but such a one. That was consideration enough.

The President put into that agreement, as to all parts of it, a condition that Congress should give this authority, because he did not want to exert on his own behalf or in his own right powers that I think were plain enough to enable him to acquire that right, but not to pledge us that we would not go somewhere else if we saw proper. He had not pledged us not to go anywhere else if we should see proper. That part of it is a contract, an agreement, what we call a contract of perfect obligation, no feature of it being left open for future adjustment, no qualification to be made of it hereafter. Based upon that contract is the agreement for a future negotiation.

Therefore the future negotiation is a protocol of agreement in reference to a fixed agreement that is already settled in the contract. It is a new agreement in which each party, of course, is at perfect liberty to bring forward its own terms, but each of them is bound to do what is right. If I engage to sell to the honorable Senator my house, in which I reside, at a fair price, and I make him a deed and he takes possession and comes to me to know what is a fair price, I say "$50,000." "Oh," he says, "what are you talking about? It is not worth $20,000; I can not give it." "Then give me back my deed." "No, sir; I will not do it. I have taken your deed and I have moved in here, and I want you now to take a fair price for that property."

How are we going to fix it? He files a bill in equity for a specific performance, and the court says, through its master commissioner, What is a fair price for this property? And he looks into the question and reports on it, and the chancellor makes the decree and there settles the dispute.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I never understood that courts would compel the specific performance of a contract which the parties had not made. In other words, the courts never make a contract for the parties.

Mr. MORGAN. Never at all?

Mr. SPOONER. And specifically enforce it.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no contract made here until Congress gives the President that authority, but the moment Congress gives the President of the United States that authority the contract is obligatory.

Mr. SPOONER. After it is made.

Mr. MORGAN. It has already been made. Mr. McKinley made it, leaving it to Congress to say whether they would give him authority. It need not have been done, but it was his right to do it.

No; do not let us try to get out of an obligation of this kind when the governments we are dealing with honorably come forward and say: "We respectfully insist that the question shall be submitted to Congress. If Congress decides against us, then we are free; but until Congress decides that the President shall not have that authority we are not free. We can not in the presence of that engagement make a contract with Great Britain, Germany, or France that we will give to them the same privileges that we have offered to the United States, exclusive rights," etc. Why? Because the contract is obligatory until Congress has acted within a reasonable time. That is all of it.

Now, who can cut us loose from these obligations that we are under to Nicaragua and Costa Rica, created by the act of this wise President? Who is going to cut us loose, and how are you going to do it otherwise than by choosing a different route for the canal than Nicaragua? If you choose the Colombian route of course that breaks it all up. That releases Nicaragua and Costa Rica. They can go where they please to make their contract for the building of a canal, and they will be very apt to find customers, plenty of them. They need not go any further than the transcontinental railroads to do that. Out of their $300,000,000 a year they can build the canal without any trouble.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, suppose that we passed the Hepburn bill or accept the protocol, as he calls it, what would be the status so far as any contract between Nicaragua and Costa Rica is concerned? Would we not be obliged to make a treaty with them to define all the terms and to agree upon the price and to fix——

Mr. MORGAN. It so turns out that HEPBURN had wisdom—I suppose it was wisdom, I do not think it was merely luck—to provide in his bill that the President may acquire these rights.

Mr. SPOONER. But he would have to do it upon an agreement, would he not?

Mr. MORGAN. He would have to do it upon an agreement, but the agreement has been already made and entered into.

Mr. SPOONER. He would have to negotiate an agreement?

Mr. MORGAN. No; I beg the honorable Senator's pardon; the agreement has been made to pass the right and also to make an agreement about it for its complete execution, in detail. He is not lawyer enough to break down that point, learned as he is in the law.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not claim to be very much of a lawyer, but I do claim as a layman——

Mr. MORGAN. I can not admit that you are a layman.

Mr. SPOONER. If I am neither lawyer nor layman——

Mr. MORGAN. I am controverting the position of a very talented and able lawyer. That is what I know about it.

Mr. SPOONER. But has any agreement been made as to the terms on which we would have these concessions from Costa Rica and Nicaragua?

Mr. MORGAN. A perfect agreement is already made, subject to ratification by Congress——

Mr. SPOONER. I am speaking of the protocol.

Mr. MORGAN. Wait a moment. A perfect agreement has been made, subject to the ratification of Congress, as I have stated, to acquire and to concede on the part of these States to the United States the exclusive right to construct, own, and control a canal in perpetual right through a certain demarcation of territory, which we designate by a description of the terminals and also the country through which it shall pass.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator tell me what are the terms agreed upon?

Mr. MORGAN. Why, of course, as to that——

Mr. SPOONER. What are the terms?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator understands perfectly well that it is expressly reserved in that agreement that there shall be a future negotiation.

Mr. SPOONER. But suppose we did not agree with Nicaragua and Costa Rica, what is our right and where is your remedy? Where is your tribunal to compel specific performance?

Mr. MORGAN. There is no arbiter between governments; and if we have no remedy to enforce a treaty right we had better close up shop and quit pretending to be a world power.

Mr. SPOONER. But we have not yet a treaty that fixes the right.

Mr. MORGAN. But suppose we can not agree on a treaty.

Mr. SPOONER. Then what?

Mr. MORGAN. Then, of course, justice and equity must settle it.

Mr. SPOONER. But where is the tribunal that is to settle it?

Mr. MORGAN. The tribunal is in the power of the nation.

Mr. SPOONER. That means an army?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; or whatever may be necessary. We have acquired the Philippines from Spain. We have acquired Cuba from Spain, and set Cuba possibly free, with a string tied to it. Suppose Spain should, contrary to that treaty, come and say, "There are a lot of gentlemen in your country who contend that the treaty was unconstitutional and think you had not any right to make it. You were wrong, anyhow, in every possible position, and we take the side of those gentlemen and of some great political party in your country, and say you had no right to make it." The United States would have to correct that impression on the mind of Spain. How would she do it? She would do it by sending a fleet out there to visit her a second time.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. MORGAN. And that is the only way she has got?

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. MORGAN. How does the Senator from Wisconsin undertake, on this floor, in this great tribunal, to controvert with me about the question as to what are the rights of a State when her treaty obligations and rights are broken or questioned?

The ultima ratio regis is what controls in this matter. There is no tribunal but that, and we make no treaty where that power and method of solving difficulties arising under it does not have a place. I do not care to discuss a point that every tyro and every hornbook student of the law knows all about. I prefer that the Senator would question me on some point that involves more extended learning.

Mr. President, I laid out last night some of the things I wanted to say—nearly all of them—for the purpose of escaping the interruptions that Senators are very apt to make when they get interested in a question, and especially those who make their first study of a question when a man is on the floor advocating it. I do not say that about the Senator from Wisconsin, and I will again recur to my notes.

The Panama Canal Company seems fated to cause convulsions there, to put great nations in a state of disorder, and to draw good men, like the American Committee, and a Secretary of the Navy into questionable enterprises. It tried, with every possible insinuation and flattery, and even ventured on rude and offensive intrusions, to divert Mr. McKinley from his convictions and to change his purpose to build the Nicaraguan Canal. But this is another story which I will hereafter present to the Senate.

When that company of unsavory reputation found that it had reached the end of its tether, it tore loose from all restraint, turned its president out of office, and made the cable hot under the Atlantic in giving to Admiral Walker the information that it had concluded to enrich the United States by dropping its price for its property $69,000,000 at the first pop toward a sale of its magnificent ditch, with all its appurtenances and contingencies of earthquakes, norther, doldrums, yellow fever, Chagres fever, smallpox, leprosy, Monkey Hills, cemeteries, Bohio dams and Culebra cuts, Chagres floods and Chagres droughts, and the most varied and turbulent general assortment of humanity that can be found in the world for recruiting mobs and insurrections.

The falling in of this great combination by a sudden collapse seems to have jarred the Senator from Ohio from the known sturdiness of his business principles.

For the supposed saving of $5,000,000 in the cost of a canal the Senator from Ohio is willing that we should become residuary legatees of this varied and interesting estate, with all the bars sinister on the family escutcheon, and that President Roosevelt, with all the other dangerous political questions with which fate compels him to deal, shall become the executor, with the will annexed, of the New Panama Canal Company and also the administrator de bonis non of the old company.

If the President has any political ambitions, I hope I need not remind him of the Trojan horse, or the gift-bearing Greeks, so much ridden in our political circuses.

In order to get at the true situation of this volcanic eruption in the Panama Canal Company, I must read from his speech what the Senator from Ohio said about it, and his complaint that the House would not delay its action until the canal company had time to turn out its president, wreck the company, get decrees from the French court to legalize what they were going to do, and not what they had done, and to perform the act of felo-de-se without too much precipitation, and to move more in accordance with business methods.

He says, "These brought into this question an entirely new feature that was never considered for one moment in the debate in the House." It seems not to have come through the door of the sheepcot, but by some back way. The Senator says that "through discussions in the newspapers and the gossip in the corridors members of that body came to know something about it and that something new was coming."

That is not surprising, for in this effort to build a canal for the American people something new has all the time been coming, and up to this last intervention by cable, of this mighty sacrifice to prevent Congress from destroying the country by building the Nicaraguan Canal, these new obstructions have not failed to arrive in time to prevent Congress from this reckless delinquency.

I must reserve a special statement of these methods for another time during this debate, as I have much more important matters now to be presented.

That no injustice may be done the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] I will read the entire context of his remarks as to the want of consideration by the House of the Hepburn bill. The Senator said in his speech on the 9th of June:

Now, in the consideration of this question, I want to call attention to another fact. Reference has been made here to the fact that the House has already passed the bill known as the Hepburn bill, which was offered, I think, on the second day after the Senate met and placed upon the Calendar. That bill had passed the House (January 9, 1902) a week before this supplementary report was made (January 18, 1902)—

That is, the supplementary report of the Commission—and passed the House within a few weeks after the first report was made by this Commission (November 16, 1901); and that report was hurried, demand being made on the Commissioners that it must be speedily furnished; and they say that it was a very unsatisfactory report to them as to details.

Ordinarily men of business and of affairs, in going into a venture involving the expenditure of $200,000,000, would go very slowly and would be very certain of knowing just what they were doing.

When the Hepburn bill passed the House of Representatives, I do not believe there were twenty-five men in that body who had ever read that report, brief as it was, and scores of them have told me since that they knew nothing about it, except that they were voting for what they supposed to be a canal. They wanted the Nicaragua Canal, because it had grown into the sentiment of the people. One week after that bill passed, the offer of the Panama Canal Company, agreeing to accept the price which we had put upon their property, $40,000,000, was submitted to Congress by the President with the supplemental report of the Commission.

Then he goes on to express what I have just read.

I have no parliamentary or personal criticism to make as to the propriety of such a statement on the floor of the Senate. But it is an injustice to that great coordinate body that it should be accused of hasty legislation on this or any other question.

It is the common habit to accuse the House of having abandoned its legislative functions into the hands of its Committee on Rules, and that deliberation in that body is a matter of grace and favor on the part of the majority, and is not a matter of right.

They could well retort that the Senate, being a body of the largest liberty in discussion, waters down its debates into a series of orations that seldom partake of the nature of legislative discussions.

But the injustice of the statements I am speaking of consists in its manifest inaccuracy when compared with the recorded facts of legislative history in the discussion of the first and second Hepburn bills in the House.

I have a statement here that shows exactly when those bills were discussed and when passed.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I simply wish to inquire of the Senator from Alabama how much longer he expects to occupy the floor? I make the inquiry with a view of possibly getting in some other business.

Mr. MORGAN. I expect to talk as long on this bill as my judgment convinces me it is right to keep the floor; and I say that out of no disrespect to the Senator. I do not think that I am under any obligation to yield to other Senators in the afternoon hour, when they have all the morning hour in which to take up those bills.

Mr. BURTON. I only made the inquiry.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know. I do not think it will be long; I hope not, because I am getting somewhat wearied, not in mind or in soul, but in body. I do not weary in trying to do right when I believe I am doing that thing.

The first Hepburn bill in the Fifty-sixth Congress was introduced in the House on the 17th of February, 1900, made a special order on May 1, 1900, passed in the House May 2, 1900.

Now, there was from February to May that that House had to determine this question; longer than we have taken since the report of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals has come before this body, and the report of the minority of the committee did not come before the body until a day or two days before the debate began. We did not know what they were going to say about it.

I was very much in hopes they would agree to vote for the bill of the majority of the committee until I saw that every possible point that could be made, however unimportant, was made, and that, finally, it was supported by an argument of Mr. Cromwell, the ubiquitous and ever-present counsel of the Panama Canal Company. Colombia stands aside and Cromwell takes the helm.

The Hepburn bill, No. 3310, was passed in the present Congress—the bill that is now before the Senate—was reported in the House December 6, 1901, favorably; made a special order December 19, 1901, and passed the House January 9, 1902. It seems seems to me that it would be even longer time than necessary to debate almost any question.

But there has been no economy of time in the House of Representatives on this question. It has not had the fate of a political question of being thrown into the lockup of the Committee on Rules at the pleasure of a political party.

If the hours of labor spent by that large body of men in research and study of this important measure were compared with the hours of labor or in listening to those who have labored to gather and discuss the facts in the wide field covered by this subject, I fear that this free Senate, left to its own free will in all matters, would not compare with the House in its knowledge of the essential and vital facts that enter into even a proper, not to say critical, study of this subject.

The ex cathedra statement of the Senator from Ohio as to this alleged delinquency of the House is gratuitous.

His personal control of men is great, but it should not lead them into unjust and disrespectful accusations against the House of Representatives. I well remember the prophecy of Mr. CANNON on the passage of the first Hepburn bill in the House, and how literally it was verified.

Mr. CANNON said:

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] and the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] openly voice what is voiced in conversation all over this side of the House, and I presume all over that side of the House, namely, that if this was the final vote that enacted this bill into law it would not get one-fourth of the members of the House for it. Nevertheless it is proposed to pass it through the House, and the Senate is expected to hang it up until next winter. As I understand it, the legislative branch of the Government consists of the House, the Senate, and the President. Each one has its functions to perform. Whatever other men may think, for one I can not see my duty plain to vote to pass a bill that does not meet my judgment touching a great question like this. Therefore I shall vote against it.

See at what a disadvantage it places the House. First, we go to the country on the eve of a campaign, both sides hurrahing for the Nicaragua Canal, and we say, "Oh, we have passed it through the House. We do not expect it to be enacted at the other end of the Capitol. We pray and hope and expect that they will not pass it as voiced by these gentlemen who speak this afternoon." Who is to be cheated? Are the people to be cheated or do we cheat ourselves touching this matter? I fancy we will not cheat the people.

I fancy that they will know as much about it as we do, and from the standpoint of sound legislation it does not become this great body that directly represents the people to pass its functions over to the other coordinate branch of Congress and say as we send it to them, "Help me or I sink."

Gentlemen may do so if they choose, from pride of opinion or temporary political popularity. I will not do it, whatever the consequences may be to me personally, because I do not believe it is right, and I do not believe it is good politics or just to the House or the people. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

And that bill came over to us. I stayed by it day and night, whenever there was a session of the Senate, without intermission, at the expense of my health, and I became very feeble at the end of the session. But thinking I was old enough to die anyway, and that it certainly would send me off, I begged and importuned, I asked unanimous consent, I made motions to take up the bill. They were voted down, but I kept on. The Senator from Ohio voted against consideration, and the bill died while it slept.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was hovering over this Chamber like a pall, alarming us with its stage thunderings and lightenings—for that was all there was to it—and threatening clamors. The Senate postponed and postponed and postponed. I followed it along even into the extra session, and made my last speech on that bill in the extra session, calling attention to these same protocols that Mr. McKinley had signed, and insisting that the Senate even then should take up the subject and consider it and pass a resolution, if it could not do anything else in favor of it.

The subject went on in the thoughts of the people. Public attention had been riveted upon it, and it spread through the country, not exactly like wildfire, but it was an inspiration that seemed to take hold of the hearts of men, women, and children. I have had correspondence from men and women from 80 to 90 years of age, down to little girls, asking me for information about this measure.

I have received a great number of letters indicating that the people everywhere are looking anxiously to the work of the Senate and wondering if Mr. CANNON'S predictions as to the fate of this bill in the Fifty-sixth Congress are going to be verified in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and if this bill is to be sent back to the House by the Senate to be strangled because we hold six-year terms and do not have to go to the people as frequently as members of the House do.

No, sir; there never was a House more in earnest and there never was a bill better understood. Not only the old membership of the House, who were here when it was passed in the Fifty-sixth Congress, but the new men who were elected upon their pledges to pass it, have studied this question with even more fidelity than a majority of the members of this honorable Senate. Those members of the House have not got a very long time to work in, and they work with diligence.

They do not take up their time in amusements, outside employments, and cloakroom deliberations. They exercise their talents like a man at work with a machine behind which there is steam power or electrical power that is bound to work the machine while the power lasts and no longer, and so they work with all diligence to make certain the prize of their high calling.

We come to judgment once in six years, and, with good professions of devotion to the people, persuade them to give us one more trial. They will not heed our professions if we again strangle the Hepburn bill at the command of Mr. Hill and other railroad magnates.

So, Mr. President, when I first saw the bill come from the House, in the midst of this tumultuous outcry of joy on the part of the people that the House had passed it with only 2 votes against it, I was asked by my friends if I did not expect now that it would whirl through the Senate. I said, "No, the Senate is not well disposed to maelstroms and whirligigs; it works deliberately and with a purpose—always with a purpose, sometimes with an inscrutable purpose."

Mr. McKinley has gone. I do not know what influences may have been left behind, but the old French Panama Canal Company, which has not failed to make an impression under all circumstances where it was possible, have omitted no means for the purpose of impressing themselves upon this Government in every form conceivable. That company will be at work again with increased force. Mr. Roosevelt is not known to us through his political experience, except through his party affiliations, and while we have the greatest respect for his courage, his manhood, and his fidelity, we do not know whether he favors this action of the House of Representatives or not. We will see.

It was a long time, Mr. President, before I could convince myself that the drama of the Fifty-sixth Congress would not be repeated in the Fifty-seventh Congress, in the Senate. When this revolution took place in the Isthmian Canal Commission there was great surprise in the country. I did not participate in it. I thought that the members of that Commission desired an opportunity for a new hearing, for there were some members on both sides who did not give an active and cordial support, as I understand, to the report of that Commission.

Some were for it, and there were some against it, but they united in a harmonious report for the sake of the reputation of the family. There were a good many men on that Commission who, I dare say, understand as little about the engineering features of the canal as I myself do. I have no education about it except such as I have derived from listening to men who profess to know what they are talking about. That is all I know about it.

Mr. President, we have got this subject back here in such form that we can legislate, and every man who proposes an amendment to this bill begins his amendment by assuring the Senate and the country that his object is to get a canal; and yet we all know that if we pass the Hepburn bill with any amendment upon it, it is liable to undergo that sort of treatment in the other House which measures have so often received there—to have the key turned in the lock of the Speaker's desk and never to open it until the majority of the Committee on Rules desires that the bill shall come to a vote.

It goes to the Speaker's Calendar; it remains there; and it will take a revolution in that House as against its rules and orders to bring the bill before the House again for consideration—not that the bill has not got the strength, but there is nobody in that House and no combine of men in that House who have the strength to break down the rules so long as the Committee on Rules are against them.

Therefore, if they get the bill before the House with an amendment, it will be done in the nature of a revolution against those rules. So my anxiety has been all the time, inasmuch as I believe the Hepburn bill is a full and wise provision, at least for the present, to secure the great foundation on which we can rest the rights of the American people with absolute confidence.

If there may be, according to the suggestion of anybody, some imperfections in the manner in which this canal is to be built, what an easy task it is, after we have all agreed upon the route and that we will have a canal, to arrange the best possible method for its construction. For instance, I do not know any better method than that of having the Secretary of War to construct or at least to inaugurate it. There is a period of at least two years in the building of either of these canals that must be devoted to establishing a plant to install the work.

What is that? Selecting men to conduct the work, engineers, skilled operatives, men who control labor, men who are organizers, camps, hospitals, supplies, shelter for operatives, machine shops, railways, and all the preliminary work. That will occupy two years for installation upon either of these canals. During that period of time, to whom could we trust these preparatory arrangements better than to the Secretary of War, with his great corps of engineers, from whom he can select picked men to perform these duties under the obligations of official bonds, duties, and oaths? That would be a wise provision to start out with. We may want to change. If we do, we have got to work under a safe plan until we get ready to change it, and we should not try to change it now.

The objections that are made to the form in which this bill is arranged, and the want of proper provision for the conduct of the business after the rights are acquired, reminds me of the lady who belonged to the Ascensionists; and when the day of judgment had been appointed and was coming around, she waked up in the morning and put on her ascension robes, white and beautiful as the driven snow, and went around among her neighbors without a certain part of the headdress on her, called the aureole, in a disordered condition.

They asked what was the matter, why she was not arrayed in such a way as to be received with due courtesy in the Kingdom of Heaven, to which they were all bound upon that ascension day. Well, she said she had tried her best—I think she said her darnedest—to get that aureole to fit, but it would not do so, and so she had concluded that she would not go. [Laughter.]

So there are members here who can not at all be pleased or accommodated with the proper manner of building the canal, and so they conclude they will not vote for the bill because they can not look far to the future and get the machinery of construction fixed up to suit themselves. That sort of a friend of the canal is a very weak brother. He has not got much faith in the canal, and very much less faith in the commands of the people.

Mr. President, I have broken away from the manuscript that I have been plodding through here for the sake of preventing myself from taking up too much time in this debate, and I want to get on to a part of this matter, very brief indeed, and very important, and it will take but a few moments to dispose of it.

Mr. HOAR. Would the Senator rather go on to-night or in the morning?

Mr. MORGAN. I want to go right on now. The Senator is very kind, but I prefer to complete my remarks. It will take but a moment.

Mr. HANNA. I would not interrupt the Senator were it not that I have an engagement. I simply want to give notice that on Wednesday of next week at 2 o'clock I shall again take the floor on this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Will you speak longer than 6 o'clock? If you intend to go on until 6 o'clock, I will take the floor at 6 o'clock and continue until midnight. I am responsible for this bill and have the right to conclude the argument on the bill, according to parliamentary usage.

Mr. HANNA. I am sorry the Senator raises that question.

Mr. MORGAN. I am bound to raise it.

Mr. HANNA. I explained the fact to the Senator from Alabama that I shall be obliged to go out of the city for two or three days the last part of the week, and having consented to a postponement of the vote until Thursday next, which I hoped would be reached on Saturday afternoon, I certainly want a little time on my return, which will be on Wednesday morning.

I am not particular about closing the debate, but I do think that in view of the situation and the agreement made that the vote shall be taken on next Thursday, I am not asking anything unreasonable when I ask to be allowed an hour or two hours on Wednesday afternoon. I have not the ability or the facility for debate which the honorable Senator from Alabama has.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Ohio is by about twenty-five years a younger man than I am. I have not any doubt about it. Certainly he is twenty-five years more vigorous than I am; and when I asked him the question if he would close by 6 o'clock, he was indefinite about it.

I will now ask unanimous consent of the Senate that on Thursday morning at the close of the routine morning business this bill may be taken up for debate; and, as we take a vote on it at 2 o'clock, that will give me the opportunity to exercise the ordinary privilege of reply.

Mr. HANNA. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We might meet earlier on Thursday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent that immediately after the conclusion of routine business on Thursday morning next this bill may be laid before the Senate for its consideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOAR. Does "routine business" mean that if a resolution comes over from a previous day that resolution may occupy the time until 2 o'clock? Is that "routine business" in the sense of this unanimous-consent agreement?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that a resolution coming over in that way is a part of the routine morning business.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] both treat this subject of the Panama Canal as being entirely new, something that had never before been considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama will please allow the Chair one moment. The Chair always announces the close of the morning business before a resolution coming over from a previous day is taken up for consideration. The Chair understands the unanimous-consent agreement is that this bill shall be taken up when the Chair announces the morning business is closed.

Mr. HOAR. What happens, then, to such a resolution as I have referred to? Does that have the same right on the following day? Suppose on Wednesday morning a Senator offers a resolution, another Senator objects to it, and it goes over one day, do I understand the Chair to say that that is not routine business within the meaning of this agreement? Would the Senator who had offered that resolution lose his opportunity to be heard?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks he would, unless in the unanimous-consent agreement that was included.

Mr. HOAR. It ought to be understood, then, that a resolution coming over from a previous day should not lose its place for the following day.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope that it will be so understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that will be the understanding, and a resolution coming over will hold its place for the next day.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to ask a parliamentary question. What would be the effect of the agreement to take up this bill after the routine morning business upon the agreement now standing as to the shipping bill? Would it displace that?

Mr. MORGAN. I hope not, Mr. President. I hope the shipping bill will be disposed of before that, and I know the Senator does.

Mr. NELSON. If the shipping bill is not disposed of before that time, does this agreement displace it only for that day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Only for that day.

Mr. NELSON. And would it still hold its place after that day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it has been assumed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HANNA], as I remarked a moment ago when I was interrupted, that the Panama Canal question was not duly considered before it was brought here in this proposition to buy the Panama Canal for $40,000,000, and that the offer got here nine days too late for the action of the House of Representatives. The intimation is that if it had got here sooner it would have torn things up by the roots, and the Hepburn bill never would have passed. That is the intimation.

I want to show something about that. In 1874, I believe it was, the Secretary of the Navy appointed Lull to survey the Nicaragua Canal route, and Menocal was the chief surveyor; and in 1875 or 1876 the Secretary of the Navy appointed Lull to survey the Panama route, Menocal still being the chief engineer. The Panama route was examined with great care and particularity, and reported upon, and I have Lull's report on the Panama route here. I suppose all Senators who feel interested in this question have looked at it.

I have just this one thing to say about it. The route that Menocal selected and surveyed and reported upon on that occasion is precisely the route upon which the isthmian canal, if it is ever to be built there, is located—right over the route Menocal pointed out as the route to build the canal. He studied it carefully and reported upon it fully. At that time Admiral Ammen was the chief of the American Canal Exploration, I believe it was called. I forget the name of the Commission. The work was commenced by General Grant.

Admiral Ammen was instructed to examine every route along that Isthmus, from Tehuantepec down to Darien, along with his colleagues. He employed the greatest engineers, and had the whole route thoroughly examined, and it was under that commission that the Menocal survey of Panama was made and reported. The Ammen commission, after two years of careful and very industrious work, came in with their report. General Grant was then in the office of President, and thereupon, when De Lesseps convened his congress of nations in Paris, Ammen and Menocal were sent there to represent the United States. So that the Panama route was not only carefully surveyed and reported upon, but it was taken before that congress, and in the presence of all the able engineers of the world it was discussed.

After that, and after he had gone out of the Presidency, in February, 1881, General Grant wrote a signed article on the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, contributed to the North American Review in February, 1881. I want to read a part of what he said. I want to show this country that a great, wise, thoughtful man had looked through this subject as deeply and as profoundly as we have; and, sir, much more carefully. He had a clearer light upon it than this Senate has to-day; and to show what his decision was, after discussing the advantages of the canal to the American people in the most thoughtful way—very concise and very clear—General Grant proceeds to say:

A continuous coast line, including our Eastern and Western shores, therefore promises an increase of this navigation sufficient of itself to make a canal a matter of the utmost importance to our people.

In view of these advantages the question naturally arises with regard to the most feasible route for the canal, both as regards economy of construction and convenience in use. On this point it would hardly seem as if there were room for controversy. The difficulties which surround the Panama scheme have been so frequently and so forcibly set forth that they need not be elaborately repeated here.

The floods of this region, caused by sudden and immense rainfall, have attracted the attention of the most careless traveler and have perplexed and confounded the scientific engineer in his attempts to provide some method by which to overcome the difficulties which they create. The impassable and unhealthy swamps lying along this route have always been considered unfit for a water course and so destructive to human life that labor and death seemed to have joined hands there. The necessity for long and expensive tunnels or open cuts and for a safe viaduct has added vastly to the expense of the route when estimated, and to the obstacles to be overcome by engineering.

The most careful surveys have always developed a discouraging want of material for construction. The addition of 500 miles to the distance between New York and the ports on the west coast of the United States by the Panama route over that of any other feasible route proposed, and the long and tedious calms which prevail in Panama Bay have never failed to create opposition to this route in the mind of the navigator. The enormous cost of the Panama Canal, moreover, has never been denied.

Considering the engineering difficulties attending the diversion of the Chagres River, and the necessary construction of an artificial lake to hold its floods, together with the tunneling, or open cuts, to which allusion has already been made, the cost of this canal can not be less than $400,000,000, and would probably be much more, including the payment to the Panama Railroad for its concession. No American capitalist would be likely to look for dividends on an investment like this.

Turning from the Panama route, therefore, as one which, when practically considered, has but little to recommend it, either as a commercial convenience or a financial success, we are brought to the consideration of the Nicaragua route, as that to which the attention of the American public is most strongly drawn at this time. The advantages of this route are: The ease and economy with which the canal can be constructed; the admirable approaches to it from the sea, both east and west; the distance saved between Liverpool and the North American ports over that of the Panama route, and the distance saved, also, between New York and other Atlantic cities and the ports of the United States on the Pacific.

Now, Mr. President, I will ask that this document be inserted as an appendix to my remarks, not omitting to publish in the body of the remarks what I have just read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the matter will be printed as an appendix. (See Appendix.)

Mr. MORGAN. Here we are presented with the full and clear history of the case. Who has in all this time, in report or speech or otherwise, presented this case to the Senate of the United States in such a clear and convincing light as that strong-minded, level-headed great man, Ulysses S. Grant. Who has done it? Who can answer this strong and true statement?

The Isthmian Canal Commission has not answered it with their doubling and doubts about engineering and other questions. They did not dare to mention it when they came to make their ultimate report. I appeal to that authority which is not only convincing but satisfactory, true, reliable, just. I appeal to it as casting more real light, sensible reflection, and judgment upon this question than any man has been able to cast upon it either in reports of commissions or reports of committees of the Senate or by speeches delivered at these desks.

Was it in time? If the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Indiana had ever read that report, they would never have said here that the Panama Canal question had had no consideration in this body or in the House, except as a sentiment, until and within such a short time that the House could not and did not consider it.

Is anybody to suppose that the House of Representatives, with its body of great and distinguished men, who have had the leading and chief part in the management and conduct of this Government for so many years—a task that would have defied the genius of any European statesmen—has hastily and thoughtlessly acted upon a great question like this, a question of nations, of the world, and all the generations to come, without having duly considered what it was doing?

I regret, Mr. President, that from the floor of the Senate there should go an accusation against the House of Representatives that it was acting in haste because it did not wait for the coming of some unknown project which was hinted at, as the Senator from Ohio says, in the gossip among the members, in the lobbies of the House, and through the newspapers.

He complains that the House of Representatives, after having listened to Grant and Ammen and a great many men of the highest ability who have ever written or spoken upon a subject like this, did not wait for the coming of something that had been spoken of in the newspapers, in conjectures, and in gossip, as he says, and that has floated about in the lobbies of the House. I leave the Senator and the case at this point for the present. I have some other matters that need to be stated, which I will tell to the Senate when no one else wants the floor.

APPENDIX.

[Senate Document No. 207, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

THE NICARAGUA CANAL.

February 19, 1902.—Referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLATT of New York presented the following article on the construction of the Nicaragua Canal, by Gen. U. S. Grant, contributed to the North American Review in February, 1881.

The construction of a ship canal across the isthmus which connects North and South America has attracted the attention of governments, engineers, and capitalists, in this country and in Europe, for considerably more than half a century. The allusions to the possibility and importance of such a work made by travelers and scientists, almost from the time when America was discovered down to the day when practical investigations were commenced by the Government of the United States, had left a deep impression on the public mind; and the rapid growth of the American Republic in population and wealth, the increasing commerce between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, the long, tedious, and dangerous passage from shore to shore around Cape Horn, all tended to strengthen this impression and to establish the conviction that the interest of the American people in the commerce of the world required a water communication, from sea to sea, across the Isthmus of Darien.

It is now more than fifty years since this project first received serious consideration on this continent. Under the Administration of Mr. Adams, in 1825, correspondence and negotiations commenced, which have continued up to the present time. Turning from one government to another for aid in carrying out the scheme, the people of Central America soon arrived at the conclusion that they must look to the United States for the completion of the work, and that to them especially, on account of location and institutions, belonged the right to unite with that State through whose territory the canal might run, in its construction and control.

In 1830, in 1831, in 1835, in 1837, in 1839, in 1844, in 1846, in 1849, in 1858, plans were proposed to the Governments of the United States, England, and France for the commencement of the work, until the breaking out of the civil war in this country presented a more important topic for consideration, and overshadowed all questions relating solely to industrial development and international commerce, and ended in results which have given new and vast interest and importance to every enterprise which can add power to the Republic and advance the prosperity of its people.

Stepping at once into the front rank among the powerful nations of the earth, the United States has entered, as it were spontaneously, upon a career of development almost unparalleled in the history of the world. By the growth of States along the Pacific coast, by the erection of transcontinental lines of railway, by the occupation of new lands, by the opening of new mines, by increasing mechanical and manufacturing enterprises, by the introduction of her products on an amazing scale into the commerce of the world, by her devotion to a system of finance which requires incessant industry among all classes of the people, and the cheapest possible means of intercourse and transportation, the United States has given new and deeper importance to every method by which industry can be advanced and commerce can be promoted.

It is during this short period that the value of even the most expensive highways has been proved, that mountain ranges have been penetrated by costly tunnels, and distant seas have been connected by costly canals, and it has been demonstrated that the most extravagant investments in works of this description are remunerative under the vast commercial ebb and flow which characterizes the present age. Of the necessity for and advantage of intercommunication of every description, therefore, there seems to be no longer a doubt; and it is with this conviction that the United States Government is called on to consider now once more the value and importance of an interoceanic canal on this continent.

Of the advantages of this canal to our industry and commerce it becomes us, therefore, first to speak. In this connection it should not be forgotten that the States of North and South America lying along the Pacific furnish in large abundance those commodities which are constantly supplied with markets in almost every country of Europe. Of guano and niter the trade is immense. From the ports of Chile nearly 400,000 tons of freight are shipped eastward annually. More than 1,000,000 tons of grain are shipped each year from the Pacific States and Territories.

There is no doubt that more than 4,000,000 tons of merchandise find their way from these regions to the East and require water communication in order that they may be shipped economically and profitably; and this is merchandise to which railway transportation across the continent is wholly inapplicable. The great wheat crops of California and Oregon, for instance, find their way to Liverpool around Cape Horn at the freight rate of 50 cents per bushel—a rate which would not carry it by rail halfway to Boston or New York or Philadelphia, to be there shipped to its European destination.

In addition to the commerce of the North and South American ports referred to, there may be estimated also the advantages which would accrue to the trade of Australia and the remote East Indies bound to Great Britain, and which would undoubtedly add 1,000,000 tons to the freight seeking a passage through the canal. When we consider the time and distance saved by the canal for this vast amount of merchandise by avoiding the passage around Cape Horn, and the importance in these days of rapid transit, and of a ready approach to a destined market, we can readily understand the value of the enterprise to producer and shipper and consumer alike.

Leaving out of consideration the dangers and delays of the Cape, we should not forget that by the canal now proposed the distance from New York to Hongkong is shortened 5,870 miles; from New York to Yokohama, 6,800 miles: from New York to San Francisco, 8,600 miles; from New York to Honolulu, 6,980 miles; from Liverpool to San Francisco, 6,065 miles, and from Liverpool to Callao, 4,374 miles; and we need no longer question the value of an interoceanic canal on the Western Continent, as we have long since abandoned all doubt of the value of the Suez Canal to the commerce of the nations of the East.

To Europeans the benefits and advantages of the proposed canal are great; to the Americans they are incalculable. Forming, as a canal properly organized and constructed would, a part of the coast line of the United States, it would increase our commercial facilities beyond calculation. Interfering in no way with the interests of those lines of railway which connect the Atlantic States with the Pacific, but tending rather to stimulate and increase the activity out of which their traffic grows, it would cheapen all staple transportation and add vastly to the ease and economy of emigration from the East to the farms and mines of the Pacific slope.

That a canal will be of great benefit to the commerce of the United States, also, there can be no doubt. Meeting, as we do, a formidable competition in the carrying trade to foreign ports, we find in our coastwise navigation an opportunity for a profitable use of American bottoms, protected by our own commercial laws. A continuous coast line, including our Eastern and Western shores, therefore promises an increase of this navigation sufficient of itself to make a canal a matter of the utmost importance to our people.

In view of these advantages the question naturally arises with regard to the most feasible route for the canal, both as regards economy of construction and convenience in use. On this point it would hardly seem as if there were room for controversy. The difficulties which surround the Panama scheme have been so frequently and so forcibly set forth that they need not be elaborately repeated here. The floods of this region, caused by sudden and immense rainfall, have attracted the attention of the most careless traveler and have perplexed and confounded the scientific engineer in his attempts to provide some method by which to overcome the difficulties which they create.

The impassable and unhealthy swamps lying along this route have always been considered unfit for a water course, and so destructive to human life that labor and death seemed to have joined hands there. The necessity for long and expensive tunnels or open cuts and for a safe viaduct has added vastly to the expense of the route when estimated, and to the obstacles to be overcome by engineering. The most careful surveys have always developed a discouraging want of material for construction.

The addition of 500 miles to the distance between New York and the ports on the west coast of the United States by the Panama route over that of any other feasible route proposed, and the long and tedious calms which prevail in Panama Bay have never failed to create opposition to this route in the mind of the navigator. The enormous cost of the Panama Canal, moreover, has never been denied.

No American capitalist would be likely to look for dividends on an investment like this.

Turning from the Panama route, therefore, as one which, when practically considered, has but little to recommend it, either as a commercial convenience or a financial success, we are brought to the consideration of the Nicaragua route as that to which the attention of the American public is most strongly drawn at this time. The advantages of this route are: The ease and economy with which the canal can be constructed; the admirable approaches to it from the sea, both east and west; the distance saved between Liverpool and the North American ports over that of the Panama route, and the distance saved, also, between New York and other Atlantic cities and the ports of the United States on the Pacific.

The cost of the Nicaragua Canal has never been estimated above $100,000,000; indeed, Civil Engineer Menocal, whose judgment and capacity have never been questioned, gives the following as his estimate of the entire cost of the work, after long and critical examination:

Western division—from Port Brito to the lake; distance, 16.33 miles; estimated cost	$21,680,777
Middle division—Lake Nicaragua; distance, 56.60 miles; estimated cost	715,658
Eastern division—from lake to Greytown; distance, 108.43 miles; estimated cost	25,020,914
Construction of Greytown Harbor	2,822,630
Construction of Brito Harbor	2,337,739
Total; distance, 181.26 miles; cost	52,577,718

A subsequent estimate, based on more recent surveys made by Mr. Menocal, has reduced this amount to $41,193,839, a reduction of $11,383,879; and by abandoning the valley of the San Juan River in favor of a direct route to Greytown, ascertained to be entirely practicable, the distance is reduced to 173.57 miles, the total canalization being but 53.17 miles.

It is well known that the Suez Canal, and, in fact, almost all great public works, cost far more than the estimates made by engineers. But applying this rule most liberally can not bring the outlay on the Nicaragua route above $100,000,000.

The surveys of this route, made subsequent to those of the other routes proposed, have developed extraordinary facilities for the work. Materials needed for construction are abundant throughout the entire line; the harbors of Brito and Greytown, at the western and eastern termini, are capable of being easily made convenient and excellent. The water supply from Lake Nicaragua is free from deposit and is abundant and easily obtained, the lake itself being the summit level of the canal.

The rainfall is not excessive. The climate during the trade winds is delightful. The country is capable of producing all the subsistence that would be required by the laborers employed in the construction of the canal. The local productions are valuable, and such as constitute many of the most important articles of commerce. In the construction, feeders, tunnels, and viaducts are not necessary. Dependent nowhere on streams, which in the rainy season are irresistibly destructive and in the dry season are reduced to mere rivulets, the canal would always be provided with a uniform and easily controlled supply of water.

A canal constructed on this route and at the estimates before us could not fail to be an economical highway as well as a profitable investment. Estimating the cost of the canal at $75,000,000, a charge of $2.50 for canal tolls and all other charges would give a gross income of $10,000,000 on the 4,000,000 tons upon which former calculations have been based. Deducting from this $1,500,000 for the expenses of maintaining and operating the canal, we have $8,500,000 as the net earnings of the work. Any reasonable modification of these figures would give an encouraging exhibit.

The liberal concessions made by the Government of Nicaragua to the Provisional Interoceanic Canal Society indicate a determination on the part of that Government to make the burthens of the enterprise as light as possible and to leave its government entirely in the hands of the American projectors. While in the Panama concession provision is made for the entry and clearance of vessels at the terminal ports, with the delays and annoyances usually attending such requirements, the Nicaragua concession avoids all interference by custom-house officials, except so far as to prevent smuggling and violations of the customs laws. This concession provides:

"There shall be a free zone upon each bank of the canal of 100 yards in width, measured from the water's edge, it being understood that the lake shores shall never be considered as the margin of the canal. Within this zone no illegal traffic shall be conducted, and the customs authorities will watch and prevent smuggling in accordance with the provisions of article 32 [of the concession]. It is expressly understood that every vessel traversing the canal will, whenever the authorities desire it, receive on board a guard [customs officer] appointed by the Government, who will, in case of discovering their violation, exercise his powers in accordance with the law."

The articles of the concession also provide that the "two ports to be constructed and to serve for entrances to the canal on each ocean are declared to be free and will be recognized as such from the beginning of the work to the end of this concession." While the administration and management of the Panama Canal, moreover, are placed in the hands of an independent company, deriving its powers from a foreign Government, and organized on the plan adopted in the construction of the Suez Canal, the commerce availing itself of the benefits of the Nicarauga Canal is protected by the Government of that country against all extortion.

In article 42 the concession provides that: "It is understood that the company, in the exercise of the powers here conferred, can not make other regulations than such as are necessary for the administration and management of the canal, and before issuing these regulations will submit them to the Government for its approval." In order to protect still further the interests of those using the canal, it is provided that all sums necessary to secure interest on the funded debts, obligations, and shares, not exceeding 6 per cent for interest, and also a sinking fund, shall be reserved; and that "what remains shall form the net gains, of which at least 80 per cent shall be divided amongst shareholders, it being understood, after ten years from the time the canal is completed, the company can not divide amongst the shareholders, either by direct dividends, or indirectly, by issuing additional shares or otherwise, more than 15 per cent annually, or in this proportion, for dues collected from the canal; and when it is discovered that the charges in force produce a greater net gain they will be reduced to the basis of 15 per cent per year." These provisions indicate not only the confidence of the projectors in their enterprise, but also the determination of the Nicaraguan Government to guard against all possible injustice to the commerce finding a highway there.

That there are other advantages contained in the concession of the Nicaraguan Government, and in the proposed administration and management of the Nicaragua Canal, there should be no doubt in the mind of every American who believes in the power and supremacy of his Government on this continent. The concession is made to Americans, the society is made up of Americans, the corporators are Americans, and the act of incorporation is asked of an American Congress.

Every step of this project recognizes the right of the United States to guard with jealous care the American Continent against the encroachment of foreign powers. To this policy no nation and no cluster of adjacent nations, watchful of their own individual or collective interests, should take exception. It is the foundation of national existence everywhere. An American man-of-war, having on board the greatest naval commander of modern times, pauses for forty-eight hours at the mouth of the Bosphorus to recognize the right of a European power to control the waters of the Dardanelles and the Black Sea.

It can not be supposed for a moment that an American company, incorporated by the American Government, organized on American soil, would have been allowed to construct the Suez Canal, even if it had established a branch of its enterprise in France and placed it under the supervision of a distinguished and representative French official. And so it is with us. The policy laid down in the early days of the Republic, and accepted from that time to this by the American mind, by which the colonization of other nationalties on these shores was protested against, should never be forgotten.

The violation of this policy has always roused the American people to a firm assertion of their rights and cost one American statesman, at least, a large share of the laurels he had won by long and honorable service. The application of this principle even now secures safety and protection to a line of railway spanning the Isthmus and connecting the eastern with the western waters. The assertion of this principle by a treaty made with Nicaragua in 1849 is accepted to-day by all Americans, people and officials, with entire satisfaction.

The rejection of that treaty in order to prevent a collision between the United States and Great Britain, and to preserve unharmed the policy of an administration, is regarded as one of the most complicating and compromising acts of American diplomacy. The accepted and acceptable policy of the American Government is contained in the doctrine announced more than half a century ago by President Monroe.

It is to be found in the attitude assumed by our Government in all the long diplomatic discussion which followed the ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—a discussion in which General Cass, then Secretary of State, declared an analogous treaty as recognizing "principles of foreign intervention repugnant to the policy of the United States"—a discussion in which by negotiation Great Britain was compelled to recognize the "sovereignty of Honduras over the islands composing the so-called British Colony of the Bay Islands"—a discussion in which the President of the United States "denounced the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as one which had been fraught with misunderstanding and mischief from the beginning."

"If the Senate," said the President to Lord Napier, "had imagined that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty could obtain the interpretation placed upon it by Great Britain, it would not have passed; and if I had been in the Senate at the time it never would have passed." It is in obedience to this policy that the United States has protested against the establishment by Great Britain of a protectorate in Central America, either on the Mosquito coast or on the Bay Islands; and it is in accordance with this policy that President Hayes, in his message of March 8, 1880, declared that:

"The policy of this country is a canal under American control. The United States can not consent to the surrender of this control to any European power or to any combination of European powers. * * * The capital invested by corporations or citizens of other countries in such an enterprise must in a great degree look for protection to one or more of the great powers of the world. No European power can intervene for such protection without adopting measures on this continent which the United States would deem wholly inadmissible. If the protection of the United States is relied upon, the United States must exercise such control as will enable this country to protect its national interests and maintain the rights of those whose private capital is embarked in the work.

"An interoceanic canal across the American isthmus will essentially change the geographical relations between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States, and between the United States and the rest of the world. It will be the great ocean thoroughfare between our Atlantic and our Pacific shores, and virtually a part of the coast line of the United States. Our merely commercial interest in it is greater than that of all other countries, while its relations to our power and prosperity as a nation, to our means of defense, our unity, peace, and safety, are matters of paramount concern to the people of the United States. No other great power would, under similar circumstances, fail to assert a rightful control over a work so closely and vitally affecting its interest and welfare."

In accordance with the early and later policy of the Government, in obedience to the often-expressed will of the American people, with a due regard to our national dignity and power, with a watchful care for the safety and prosperity of our interests and industries on this continent, and with a determination to guard against even the first approach of rival powers, whether friendly or hostile, on these shores, I commend an American canal, on American soil, to the American people, and congratulate myself on the fact that the most careful explorations have demonstrated that the route standing in this attitude before the world is the one which commends itself as a judicious, economical, and prosperous work.

I have formed the opinions expressed in this article, not from a hasty consideration of the subject, and not without personal observation. While commanding the Army of the United States my attention was drawn to the importance of the water communication I have here discussed. During my administration of the Government, I endeavored to impress upon the country the views I then formed; and I shall feel that I have added one more act of my life to those I have already recorded, if I shall succeed in impressing upon Congress and the people the high value, as a commercial and industrial enterprise, of this great work, which, if not accomplished by Americans, will undoubtedly be accomplished by some one of our rivals in power and influence.

U. S. GRANT.

TERRITORIAL INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9334) to amend an act to prohibit the passage of special or local laws in the Territories, to limit the Territorial indebtedness, etc

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Territories with an amendment in line 5, after the word "laws," to strike out "of" and insert "in;" so as to read:

That the act of Congress approved July 30, 1886, entitled "An act to prohibit the passage of local or special laws in the Territories of the United States, to limit Territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes," is hereby amended so as to authorize the issuance of bonds by school districts in Oklahoma Territory having a bona fide population of not less than 5,000 persons for erecting necessary school buildings and purchasing the ground for the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I objected to this bill before on the ground that bonds which were to be sold in the market were valid only on the condition that the amount of the bonds did not exceed the valuation of the school district or whatever was the title of the corporation issuing them; and I think that is a very great defect. It was stated on the floor that there had been quite a number of precedents for acts just of this form, which to my mind makes the thing worse, because it ought to be an invariable rule to have that security for the purchaser of bonds.

But I am informed by members of the committee, especially the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM], who reported this bill, and who is a very careful lawyer, that whatever may be the weight of that objection, in this particular case there is no substantial doubt that the amount of bonds proposed will come far within the valuation, and that it may be easily ascertained; and for that reason I do not insist any further on the objection, although I beg leave to say to my honorable friend, the Senator from Indiana, that if anybody reports another bill like this and I happen to be here, I shall object to it. I have no doubt, however, the committee, after this discussion, will put in a proper provision in that respect.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator for not objecting further.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend an act to prohibit the passage of special or local laws in the Territories, to limit the Territorial indebtedness, and for other purposes."

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from New Jersey kindly withhold his motion for just a moment, in order that I may secure the passage of a pension bill?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

JULIA L. GORDON.

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4067) granting an increase of pension to Julia L. Gordon.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty-five;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia L. Gordon, widow of Jonathan W. Gordon, late major, Eleventh Regiment United States Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $35 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 49 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 13, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that what time may be left on Monday next after the disposition of other business and Tuesday be given to the Judiciary Committee. This committee has had no time assigned to it during this Congress, excepting such as we have had incidentally, and my purpose will be, I will say frankly to the House, if we are granted this unanimous consent, to call up and consider the bill H. R. 13679, being an act to amend the act establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that so much of Monday next as is left after taking up matters under suspension of the rules and all of Tuesday be given to the Judiciary Committee for the consideration of matters before that committee, the purpose being especially to call up amendments to the bankruptcy law.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from New York if he will not allow an hour or an hour and a half to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for the consideration of a bill that has been under consideration for almost an hour in the House, known as the London landing clause bill? That is unfinished business, and I think it can be disposed of in an hour or an hour and a half, and if he is willing to give that amount of time, I would have no objection to the Judiciary Committee taking the time he asks for.

The SPEAKER. It may be proper in this connection for the Chair to state that the amount of business to take up under suspension of the rules will consume all of Monday. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Saturday next may be substituted for the transaction of business on the Private Calendar which would be in order on Friday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that Saturday next be substituted for Friday next for the consideration of matters on the Private Calendar. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE OTEY.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, June 10, an order was entered providing for a session of the House of Representatives on Sunday, June 29, the session to be devoted to eulogies on the late Representative Amos J. Cummings. I ask unanimous consent that that order be so modified that after the conclusion of the eulogies provided for therein eulogies may be pronounced upon the life and character of my late colleague, Maj. Peter J. Otey.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to so modify the order in respect to the eulogies upon the life of the late Representative Cummings, to be held on the 29th of this month, that it will be in order to consider similar eulogies upon the life and character of the late Major Otey. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CORRECTION.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a correction of the RECORD. During the debate on the bill for the protection of the President I took occasion to join issue with the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. RAY of New York] on his statement of a legal proposition. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 6464, contains the following report of the colloquy between myself and the gentleman from New York, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the matter referred to will be read by the Clerk.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, only one word. In all civilized communities there is a distinction made between killing a man with an intent and purpose to effect his death and a killing without any such intent or purpose—an intent to injure where there is no intent to kill, but incidentally or otherwise you go too far and kill. We have maintained a distinction in fixing the punishment in cases of this kind. If a man intends to commit a crime while he is engaged in the commission of a felony, you might hang the offender. He is just as bad as though he had accomplished his purpose. Anyone knows that is true, but the laws of all civilized communities and of all States make a distinction. We have followed that idea, and it is followed in the Senate bill.

If a man only intends to assault the President, and not to kill him, the punishment may be imprisonment for life or a much shorter term, depending on the circumstances. That is left to the discretion of the court, and we believe the courts of this country are so intelligent that they can be trusted to impose the proper penalty when a man is convicted to give him such a sentence as he ought to receive. The distinction between the first section and this one is that the first section puts in the words "knowingly and purposely kill," etc. This section provides for those cases where there is no purpose or intent to kill, but simply an attempt to inflict grievous bodily harm. I may add that there is no State in the Union nor a civilized country on the face of the earth to-day that inflicts anything more than life imprisonment for this offense, except when in the commission of a felony a life is taken.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman is mistaken about the law.

Mr. RAY of New York. I am not mistaken. I have taken every statute and have collated them. The man that states to the contrary does not know exactly what he is talking about.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman from New York does not know all the law of this country by himself alone. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY of New York. I understand that, but we have taken all the statutes and compiled them—

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman's compilation may be all right, but his construction is wrong. I know the universal law is that a man is presumed to intend the usual consequences of his own act, and where he uses a deadly weapon, he is presumed to intend the natural and usual consequences of that weapon.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, I concede that, and I think that debate on this amendment is exhausted, and I call for a vote.

Mr. RUCKER. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD just read contained the language used by the gentleman from New York, then the interruption made by myself would be silly and absurd in the highest degree; because I concede that, as printed in the RECORD, the gentleman's position is correct; but that is not the language used by him. I have obtained from the Official Reporters a transcript of their notes, and this shows that the gentleman has modified his language. I complain of the gentleman's modifying and revising his language so as to place me in an awkward and unjust attitude in the RECORD. The exact language of the gentleman, as shown by the Official Reporters' notes, is this:

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, only one word in answer to the amendment. In all civilized communities there is a distinction made between killing a man with an intent and purpose to effect his death and killing him without any such intent or purpose, but simply intend to injure him where there is no intent to kill, but incidentally or otherwise you go too far and kill him. We have maintained this distinction in fixing the punishment. If a man intends to commit a crime and fails, while he is engaged in the commission of an actual felony, you might say hang him; he is just as bad as though he had accomplished his purpose. Anyone knows that is true, but the laws of all civilized communities of all States make a distinction according to the intent. We have followed out that idea, and it is followed out in the Senate bill.

If you simply intend to assault the President and not to kill him according to the grievousness of the injury inflicted, it may be imprisonment for life or a much shorter term. That is left to the discretion of the court, and we believe the courts of this country are so intelligent that they can be trusted to impose the proper penalty and when a man is convicted to give such a penalty as he ought to receive. The distinction between the first section and this one is that the first section puts in the words "knowingly and purposely kill," etc. This section provides for those cases where there is no purpose or intent to kill, but simply an attempt to inflict grievous bodily harm. I may add that there is no State in the Union nor a civilized country on the face of the earth to-day that inflicts anything more than life imprisonment for this offense.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman is mistaken about the law.

Mr. RAY of New York. I am not mistaken. I have taken every statute and have collated them. The man that states to the contrary does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman from New York does not know all the law of this country by himself alone. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY of New York. I understand that, but we have taken all the statutes and compiled them——

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman's compilation may be all right, but his construction is wrong. I know the universal law is that a man is presumed to intend the usual consequences of his own act, and where he uses a deadly weapon he is presumed to intend the natural and usual consequences of the use of that weapon.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a comparison of the gentleman's language as printed and as actually delivered shows the modifications which the gentleman made in revising his remarks, and the changes put me in the attitude of controverting a well-recognized principle of law. The gentleman evidently realized that there was some force and merit in the objection I made to his statement of the legal proposition, and he modified his statement so as to avoid the objections made by me. Now, since the gentleman did not do me the courtesy to ask me to withdraw my language in order that he might edit his remarks and place himself in the RECORD as he ought to be placed, as a great lawyer of this House, I insist that the language used by the gentleman ought to go into the RECORD, or else the language used by myself, in courtesy to me, ought to be taken out of the RECORD. I do not care which horn of the dilemma the gentleman takes.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, the only possible difference between the gentleman and myself is this: When I stated the rule of law on the floor, in the hasty colloquy that was taking place, I stated the general rule. The gentleman took issue with me. It did not occur to me at the moment that I had not stated the exception to the rule. The gentleman said I had not stated the rule correctly, as I understood him, and I took issue with that statement. Now, when I looked over the remarks that were actually made, I found that I had not stated the exception that I should, and in revising my remarks I simply added the exception. I apologize to the gentleman, if he thinks that put him in an unfair situation; but as I say, when I made the statement on the floor, I concede that I omitted to state the exception to the rule. If the gentleman had called my attention to that fact, I would have made the correction at the time.

I understood him to contend that the rule I stated was not the general rule. The gentleman was correct in saying that I did not state the law correctly because I did not add the words stating the exception. I trust that with this explanation no injustice will be done the gentleman. I certainly have for him the very highest regard, not only as a gentleman but as a lawyer, and the whole difference was that in the haste of a five-minute colloquy we were both a little in error; but I will concede that I was more in error than he. Neither of us, I am sure, intended discourtesy or to charge ignorance.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's language when this bill was under discussion was that anyone who took the position I did knew nothing whatever of law; but since his conversion, and since he has to-day so clearly stated the facts and exonerated me from blame, I accept the statement made by him in the spirit in which it is made. [Applause.]

IRRIGATION OF ARID LANDS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report, which I will ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DALZELL, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the House No. 222, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report the following in lieu thereof:

"Resolved, That immediately after the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the bill (S. 3057) appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands, and consideration thereof shall continue for two days, one of which shall be devoted to general debate and one to debate under five-minute rule and for amendment. At the end of said two days a vote shall be taken. But this order shall not interfere with revenue or appropriation bills or conference reports."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the rule that has been read at the Clerk's desk is a very simple one. It provides merely for the consideration of the irrigation bill, provides for two days' debate—one for general debate and one for debate under the five-minute rule—and then calls for a vote.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me some time, additional, to discuss the proposition involved.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would like, in order to make the argument with some continuity, more time than the gentleman would agree to yield. I suggest that he yield fifteen minutes and that I can possibly get an additional five minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, to a casual observer of legislation and to those who have only casually looked into the important questions involved it may seem that two or three days' time would be ample for the discussion of the features presented by this bill. But, involving, as it does in one form or another, nearly all the principles of government for which we have stood, involving all the questions of change in the administration of the public lands, involving the abdication by the House of Representatives of its powers over appropriations, involving the constitutional questions of State and national powers, and involving home rule, for State rule is home rule, for which this side of the House for a century has stood, two days' time for the discussion of these questions is not ample to present them to the House of Representatives. It involves the whole field of appropriation, economy in expenditure, wasteful extravagance, special and political influence, jobs and deals, political and legislative.

It involves in government a change of an old and the ingrafting of a new system of laws for the regulation and control of 600,000,000 acres of public domain along untried and experimental paths.

I do not mean that irrigation is an experiment, for it has been successfully and profitably employed by State and private enterprise for ages. But to the Government it is new, experimental, and dangerous.

This change involves the abdication by Congress of its rights and its duties to appropriate money derived from taxation, money derived from the sale of land owned by all the people, and it is a surrender of these rights of the people and this prerogative of Congress to a Federal officer in the expenditure of a mountain of money, the cost of which irrigation projects is variously estimated by experts at from the lowest, $300,000,000, to the highest, $600,000,000, being the reclamation of 60,000,000 acres of irrigable land at from $5 to $10 an acre on the average.

While this estimate of 60,000,000 acres of irrigable land is made, there are yet 540,000,000 in the arid regions, and we may confidently assume, in the light of all past experiences, that the efforts of experts and officers in charge will not be relaxed till the bounty of heaven is exhausted and the flood and snow waters are no more. Cum grano salis is a good rule in passing on preliminary estimates of experts when their hearts are set on a project.

I congratulate the gentlemen of the arid regions, who have a special interest not common to the whole country, on securing consideration for this measure of interest in their districts and States but troublesome and dangerous to every other section of the country.

That it will affect them advantageously and ruinously affect all the rest of us I firmly believe, and think this will be made plain by a reading of the bill and the majority and minority reports. I can not speak in unkindness, but in praise, of Representatives of the States whose stars are fast floating away in the firmament, losing their luster, and preparing to join the milky way, but my constituency can not contribute to its own downfall to rescue them from the gloom that surrounds them, and I claim only the same rights that Representatives always exercise on this floor to protect my people as I have the understanding to perceive and the power to execute. An attempt has been made unjustly and inordinately to control the Democratic Congressional committee and to divert it into an unwarranted and dangerous path, and culminated a brief time ago in a minority acting on some sort of an irrigation resolution.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Much as I desire to continue my argument, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will you permit me to read to you the Democratic platform?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will read it presently, and the gentleman need not do so.

The simple statement of fact carries its own refutation of power and authority, and the resort to that body instead of to a Democratic caucus carries a suspicion to the act if not a condemnation of the measure in support of which this unheard-of procedure was invoked.

When analyzed and the lack of jurisdiction and authority is seen, the mode of promotion understood and the futility of the attempt is considered, the whole effort vanishes into thin air and has not the force of a feather's weight to control the head, or heart, or the conscience of a single man, as a Democratic pronunciamento.

Straws show how the wind blows and furnish figures of speech, one that was grasped after by the drowning man and the other that broke the camel's back.

For one member among the many whose election I understand it to be the sole object of the committee to secure, I am willing to concede without criticism whatever advantage those who sought this unjustifiable course can gain by the boldness of this attempt from the arid region and the utter futility of the result.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have only fifteen minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I did not understand what Democratic committee is trying to do this thing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Well, the gentleman must read my remarks. I only had yielded to me fifteen minutes by the Republican Rules Committee.

With the attitude of public men on this question so various and so divergent, the one who thinks that politics dwells in this great public question has not the forecast of a political prophet, and will awaken from his reverie to find the powder flashing in the pan, and if the fish does jump it will be from the frying pan into the fire. It will come back to plague us and our successors.

I have deep and settled convictions on the proposition for which this rule seeks consideration. I am impressed with its importance and its dangers as national legislation. It leads us to great national improvement of forests and streams, drilling of deep artesian wells, saving the former from fire and the latter from overflow and percolation. Under bills like this good roads must be built and preserves guarded by the Federal Government. Swamp lands and lake regions and all must come in for their share of Federal patrimony, when the whole matter more properly belongs to the polity of the States.

With favorable consideration of measures like this statesmen will be found drifting away, day by day, from the sacredness and safety of State rule, so strongly supported by so many in years gone by, and new recruits be found in proportion for the dangerous idea of a strong central government sought by so many to-day. The dangers in this legislation does not lurk in but one or but several of the features of this bill, but are manifold and are present in nearly all of its sections.

In this whole scheme of irrigation, too early for consideration now, I find only cause for deep foreboding. There is scarcely a line in the proposition that does not bristle with objections from a Democratic standpoint.

To my Democratic colleagues I say that you may explore the whole field of legislation upon which we have been most conservative and careful and objections repeatedly and forcibly made will be found applicable here.

Two days' time fixed by the rule to consider in its general scope and detail this measure does not furnish time enough to cover with care and pains the vast field opened up for discussion and settlement, embracing as it does so many new and so many old and objectionable features as are presented for our consideration. If there is any Democratic principle embraced in this bill, a careful analysis has failed to disclose it to me. If there is any dangerous principle that we have always fought against not contained in it, I can not now recall what it is. I do not claim to be infallible, of course, and accord to all the same right to think and speak for our party as I claim myself. I only assert now that I do not regard politics as in the bill.

I am sure it is not a Democratic bill, nor would I charge it to be a Republican bill, for I regard too highly many of my friends on the other side. To be entirely frank with the House, I regard it as an arid-land bill and nothing else.

At the beginning of this session the arid-State members in committee assembled properly elected the gentleman from Nevada chairman and proceeded to draft an irrigation bill. The committee was composed of a large majority of Republicans, but politics was submerged to get some irrigation legislation.

The committee, of course, was confronted with platforms and constitutions, national and State. Where they pointed their way, they adopted them; where they run counter, they run over them or passed them by.

They took up first the Republican national platform of 1900, and upon that this bill was drafted and introduced in the Senate. After a little while the bill passed without a division in the Senate, and went to the House Committee on Arid Lands, a majority of whose members are from arid or semiarid States.

The troubles then began. The President was for one kind of irrigation, with national control of canals and water distribution, and the Republican platforms, national, State, and Territorial, and some State constitutions of States affected, were for another kind, with State control of canals and water distribution. The President told the committee that called on him that the Senate bill was not in consonance with his ideas of irrigation; that if the United States built canals it should, to keep the water supply from politicians, control the distribution.

This information seems reliable from newspaper reports.

By looking at the bill you will find a lame, bungling effort to accomplish an impossible blending of the views of the President for national control and the contrary view of platforms and constitutions for State control. This was done in the committee room of the House. This effort makes a hotchpotch of a bill, with crudities and incongruities which, if it were possible, makes it more of a medley than when it left the Arid States Committee.

Thus it is seen that, from a Republican standpoint, it has no political significance and no political character. The effort to make it so in any way is strained and farfetched.

In view of what has transpired, I feel free to state that I named to three members of Congress from the States affected my objections, and in each instance they responded that I had not enumerated one-half of the objections to it.

Now, under these circumstances, with a bill such as this, out in Indiana, where we are in the habit of judging of political effect—you people having come out so often to discuss political matters to us, we have got in the habit of thinking on political matters—if you want to know what we would do with a man that thought such a matter bore a political significance I will tell you. We would elect him constable in some way-back township where he would get no salary, but a fee if he makes an arrest. [Laughter.]

Now, what is the Democratic position upon this subject, the gentleman asks me. Our platform was for an intelligent system of irrigation. What is an intelligent system of irrigation?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will you suggest one?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I can, in the language of him who was a high priest on irrigation at the time the platform was adopted. Surely it will not be said that this bill is an intelligent system of irrigation, or a Democratic measure. To prove this the bill need only be read. What was before Congress, before the country, or before the convention as "an intelligent system of irrigation?"

Who was the high priest of irrigation in the Fifty-fifth Congress, and what did he say? Who was the apostle to whom all others bowed then? It was the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], whom we all admire for his sterling worth.

His was the bill before the country, on the Speaker's table in the House, and it was so meritorious that even Speaker Reed allowed it to pass the outside portals. It was ably reported—the gentleman will admit this—by the gentleman himself from the Committee on Public Lands.

What was its purpose and objects? It gave a million acres to each State to aid it and to aid private enterprise to irrigate.

Let me read what the gentleman said—his judgment on the subject—on this only rational scheme of irrigation then before the House and the country:

> It seems to your committee that one of two courses must be pursued by the United States. Either the National Government must undertake the reclamation of these lands by the construction of reservoirs and canals to impound and lead the water to the lands that are to be settled, or else this Government should transfer these lands to the States, so as to permit them to undertake the work of reclamation.
> Of course the people of the arid-land States would much prefer that the work of reclamation should be undertaken by the National Government. They would like to see the National Government construct large reservoirs and canals there, but it is hardly within the range of possibility that the nation will undertake the same. The amount to be appropriated would be so large, the Representatives from the arid States are so few in number, that it can not be expected that the Government would ever enter upon the work of reclaiming these lands.

This was a solemn committee report emanating from the clear head and clean heart of that great champion of irrigation. His name gives force and strength to his reports when he is right, as he was in this case, and he no doubt moved the convention. This new scheme involves the complicated, complex, litigious, and dangerous questions of condemnation of private property in a State jurisdiction by a Federal officer, and which power and property so condemned is to be used in and for another State to irrigate public land not only, but private land as well. To illustrate: Nevada must go to California and invoke all the complicated machinery of law—must wade through the perplexing problems of condemnation and interstate rights or get no water, and this rendered still more difficult by the invoking of the law within a State jurisdiction by a Federal officer for uses not wholly within the State and not exclusively concerning United States land.

Such a conflict and litigation would arise like unto that which might come were the dead to arise and attempt to trace their ancient possessions. This scheme involves the purchase without condemnation by a United States officer from the public land fund belonging to all the people, at exorbitant figures, as it must be when the United States is the purchaser in a State jurisdiction of private property for the uses and purposes I have just named.

It involves the United States Government in the execution of an enterprise around which will cluster, like banqueters at a feast, those patriotic American citizens, with too many of which we unfortunately are cursed, who are always ready to encourage an enterprise by the Government, however stupendous, because there is something in it for themselves.

It involves the robbery of peoples of self-government in States, and while some speak for them, saying that American citizens will abjectly submit to a surrender of their sovereignty to receive these gifts of the people's lands, and submit to be governed 2,000 and 3,000 miles away, I believe that representatives of other States should save this misguided people from their friends and at once protect the interest of their own States, their own constituents.

It is charged that the land-grant railroads are the principal promoters of this legislation. This is not met with a disclaimer, but by the question, "Suppose they are?" This is a question difficult to answer satisfactorily to all, but for myself, I am unwilling to stand for a proposition embodied in this bill which my party has always stood against; unwilling to promote a system of land grants, either in the land itself or by the Government's increase of value to it, when I remember my party's opposition to the original grants and its vigorous insistence on the forfeitures of lands by the railroad corporations by reason of their refusal to comply with the terms of the grants. Others may see their way clear to go into this conflict with party doctrine, but I can not.

Even if the great railroad interests of these sections do say that the only reasons for this dangerous legislation is to give us the Asiatic trade, for my part I can not see enough of merit in this irrigation proposition from any standpoint to fly me in the face of my party's uniform attitude when it made history on both the subsidizing of railroads by land grants or on expansion, the one the real and the other the claimed reason why the railroad corporations are in favor of the bill.

This bill involves the United States Government in the employment of its machinery of government to force values and utility in land by a stupendous outlay to control the elements by conquering nature's course, thereby exerting government powers in fields that should be exploited and will be exploited by State and private enterprises as fast and as far and as prudently as the needs of the people and localities may require.

It is aimed to deter the slow but steady tide of immigration now setting in from the North to the rich mining fields of Tennessee, Alabama, and the South; to check those who, from my State and others, go South to find your sweet Southern hospitality and reach your blooming fields, and, mingling with you, give a force for the future that no arid region irrigated in the world can compare with the results of this combination, and no States can rank your Southern States in the industrial development thereby produced. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I now ask for the previous question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the gentleman will allow some time to this side.

Mr. DALZELL. How much does the gentleman desire?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think there are two gentlemen who want to speak.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time is desired?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Thirty minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield my colleague on the committee thirty minutes.

Alabama

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to detain the House at any great length in the discussion of the rule under consideration or of the bill that this rule proposes to take up for consideration. The rule now under consideration reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] comes before the House with the unanimous report of the Rules Committee. The bill for the reclamation of the arid lands in certain Western States is reported to the House by a majority of the committee which had it under consideration. All of the Democrats on the committee join in the report, and all of the Republicans except two. Both the Democratic and the Republican parties in their last national conventions indorsed the proposition of the United States Government granting aid toward the reclamation of the arid lands of the West.

I differ with the statement of my friend from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] when he says that there is something undemocratic in this bill and that it is not in line with democratic principles. The representatives of the Democratic party on the floor of this House, since the beginning of the Government have uniformly concurred in legislation giving the public lands that belong to the Government as bounties to soldiers who had fought in the various wars of our country, and also in giving these lands, or the proceeds thereof, to the States or to State institutions for educational purposes. Our predecessors on the Democratic side of the House have always taken the position that the public lands were a part of the private purse of the nation, and that the proceeds thereof were not subject to the same limitations on the expenditures as were moneys in the Treasury derived from taxation.

The Democratic party has always contended that moneys raised by taxation of the people were a trust fund paid into the Treasury for specific purposes, and that it was a violation of the trust to expend them for other than purely governmental purposes, such as maintaining the machinery of the Government, the maintenance of the Army and the Navy, and such expenditures as were necessary in carrying on the Government of the United States under the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, but no party, so far as I am informed, has ever contended that this doctrine applied to the moneys received from the sale of the public lands belonging to the nation. Let me enumerate, for a moment, the various dispositions that have been made of the public lands by our Government and at times when the Democratic party was in power in the House of Representatives.

First. Public lands were given as bounties to veteran soldiers and sailors of all wars, from the Revolution down to the civil war.

Second. They were at one time a large source of public revenue, and their proceeds were converted into the public Treasury and used for all governmental purposes.

Third. The proceeds of the public lands were used for maintaining a general land office, and for surveying and preparing the public lands for settlement.

Fourth. Before the days of railroads they were given for the construction of canals, highways, and levees.

Fifth. The sixteenth and thirty-second sections were given to the States for educational purposes.

Sixth. Large amounts of public lands have been given by Congress to various public and private colleges for educational purposes.

Seventh. The proceeds of the sale of public lands have been given to the States to maintain agricultural colleges.

Eighth. Land grants have been given to the railroads to aid in their construction and the opening up and the development of the great West.

It is now proposed to give the proceeds of the sale of the public lands in certain Western States as a trust fund for the purpose of reclaiming the arid lands of those States, and, from a constitutional standpoint, I must say that I fail to draw a distinction between giving the proceeds of the sale of the public lands to education or the lands to soldiers and sailors or to railroads, canals, or companies organized to build levees, and the giving of the proceeds of the sale of the lands in these States to the people in the States in order that they may make their own country habitable. In my judgment, in our doing so, we are only carrying out the purposes for which we originally acquired the public domains. At the close of the war for independence the territory recognized by the King of England as belonging to the thirteen colonies extended from the Atlantic Ocean to the Mississippi River on the west and from the Great Lakes on the north to the Gulf of Mexico on the south and embraced about 830,000 square miles, or 531,000,000 acres. Of this territory at least 404,000 square miles lay west of the Alleghany Mountains and was uninhabited except by the Indians.

In the year 1780 Virginia, New York, Massachusetts, and other States in the Union ceded this western territory to the Continental Congress, and it may throw some light on the present question when we consider under what terms this cession was made and for what purpose it was accepted by the Congress of the thirteen colonies. On the 10th day of October, 1780, shortly after the cession of this territory, Congress passed a resolution that the territory ceded to the colonial government—

> Shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence as the other States. * * * That the said lands shall be granted or settled at such times and under such regulations as shall hereafter be agreed on by the United States in Congress assembled, or any nine or more of them.

This resolution was the corner stone of the Territorial system of the United States and has been recognized as such from that time down to the present day. As stated in the foregoing resolution, the ultimate object to be attained was to convert this vast public domain into States of the Union. The Government accepted the lands for this purpose. In order to carry out this purpose it was necessary to open the land to settlement and induce the people to go there, for you could not have States without having inhabitants. I therefore contend that it was legitimate and in no wise a violation of the terms of our Constitution for the Government of the United States to use these lands, or the proceeds thereof, in any way that would aid in the development of the country and the settlement of the lands.

It was therefore no violation of the Constitution to grant these lands to soldiers on the condition that they settle and develod them, nor to grant certain portions of land as endowments to schools, as that had a tendency to attract population and develop the country, nor was it a violation of the Constitution to grant these lands to railroads, because without means of transportation it was impossible to develop the country, nor was it a violation of the Constitution to grant these lands to companies or individuals for the purpose of building canals to drain the lands, or erecting levees to prevent the overflow of water, because the doing of both was necessary in order to develop the lands so that they could be used for settlement and home building.

Now, is it going a single step further than we have already gone when we consider the grants for the draining of overflow lands and the raising of dikes and levees to prevent the overflow to say that we will grant these lands or the proceeds derived from the sale of public lands for the purpose of conserving the waters of their torrential streams in order that they may be used to irrigate those lands that are now barren for the lack of rainfall, and make them suitable for agricultural purposes, so that they may attract population and develop the great States and Territories of the West? I think not. In my judgment it is merely in line with the original intention of the fathers that all reasonable means should be used to attract population to the uninhabited lands of the country, in order that they might acquire the necessary population to make them thriving and prosperous States of the Union.

As I stated above, the bill merely proposes to take the proceeds of the sale of the public lands in the 17 arid States and Territories of the West that lie west of the one hundredth meridian of longitude, extending practically to the Pacific Ocean; in other words, embracing largely that territory laying westward of a line drawn through the middle of the Dakotas, Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma. The territory embraced in what is now known as the arid region covers about 600,000,000 acres of land, amounting to at least one-third of the territory of the United States with Alaska excluded. It is admitted that all of this country can not be irrigated, but it is shown by reports of the Government that about 60,000,000 acres of land are subject to irrigation and can be converted into valuable farms. Whereas if nothing is done toward the developing of this country it will remain practically a desert for all time to come.

There is nothing new in the idea of irrigating land for farm purposes. Irrigation goes back as far as the history of civilization. In fact, the first dawn of civilization seems to have originated with people who lived in a country where, to a large extent, it was necessary to resort to irrigation for agricultural development. In the great West the snow accumulates on the Rocky Mountains during the winter. In the spring and early summer it melts, and rivers that are dry in the fall become torrential streams, carrying vast quantities of water to the sea. In a few months this water flows off and the beds of the rivers are dry. There is very little rain in a large portion of this country, and in the fall of the year the crops would perish unless artificial means are used to furnish the necessary moisture in the dry months.

It is proposed by the present bill to take the proceeds of the sale of the lands in these arid States, amounting to something between a million and a million and a half a year, and turn them over to the Secretary of the Interior, as a trust fund with which to build great dams to hold the surplus waters that come down the Western rivers in the spring, and build canals carrying the waters from these dams across to the lands to be irrigated. The small ditches from the canals to the farms are expected to be built by the owners of the land. The proposition is that the lands shall be sold for homesteads at the actual cost of building the dams and canals, the money raised to go back into the trust fund for further development of other lands and the opening of new country to settlement. It is therefore seen that it is not proposed to take any money from the Treasury that is derived from the people by taxation, but merely to grant to them the proceeds of the sale of their own lands in their own States to work out their own development.

It is contended by some that this bill should not pass, because it is opening up farming lands of the West to come in competition with our Eastern and Southern farms. I have no patience with such an argument, for had our fathers pursued such a policy, neither the Middle States nor the Western States would ever have been developed, and besides that it overlooks the fact that these lands are being opened to settlement for all the people, whether they now reside in the East, South, or West. The farm boys in the East want farms of their own. It gives them a place where they can go and build homes without being driven into the already overcrowded cities to seek employment.

It will provide a place for the mechanic and wage-earner to go when the battle for their daily wages becomes too strenuous in the over-crowded portions of the East. Products raised on these lands must find a market either on the Western coast or in the Orient, as the railroad freights to the East are too great to allow the shipment of ordinary farm products eastward to compete with our own farm lands. A large portion of the arid lands will be used for the raising of fruits and products of the soil that does not come in competition with the farmers of the East. If this policy is not undertaken now, this great Western desert will ultimately be acquired by individuals and great corporations for the purpose of using it for grazing vast herds of cattle.

They will acquire the waterways and water rights for the purpose of watering stock and become land barons. Then it will be impossible to ever convert it into the homestead lands for our own people or to build up the population of this Western country. I believe the passage of this bill is in the interest of the man who earns his daily bread by his daily toil. It gives him a place where he can go and be free and independent; it gives him an opportunity to be an owner of the soil and to build a home. Those are the class of men we must rely on for the safety of the nation. In times of peace they pay the taxes and maintain the Government; in times of peril and strife they are the bulwark of the nation, and it is justice to them that this legislation be enacted into a law. [Applause.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] was a very good speech on the merits of the bill, but it did not touch the question which is before the House at the present time. The question is whether we shall give consideration to this irrigation measure, and on that question the gentleman did not utter one word, except that which might be considered as being against the bill in toto. Mr. Speaker, the fact that this measure has been agitated by the people of the United States for many years, the fact that there has been a consensus of opinion among most Americans that something in this line ought to be done, the fact that the great national parties of this country, the Democratic party and the Republican party, have seen fit to place in their platforms planks indorsing a measure of this kind, alone entitle the bill to consideration in this House; and when we take into consideration also the fact that this is a bill which has been enacted by the Senate and comes to the House, we find an additional reason why we should give the measure consideration. So that it seems to me that every single man in this House, whether he be Republican or Democrat, should vote in favor of the consideration of this bill, no matter whether the bill meets his views or not.

The gentleman from Indiana referred to these platforms. I want to call attention to the particular language which is contained in them. The Republican party met in convention at Philadelphia, Pa., a place far removed from any arid lands, it being in a part of the country where rainfall is abundant, and that convention, in response to a general demand, deemed proper to insert in its platform the following declaration:

> In further pursuance of the constant policy of the Republican party to provide free homes on the public domain, we recommend adequate national legislation to irrigate the arid lands of the United States, reserving control of the distribution of water for irrigation to the respective States and Territories.

The Democratic convention met in Kansas City. Missouri is not an arid-land State. Yet notwithstanding that fact that great convention adopted a plank in its platform relative to this subject. The language of that platform upon this subject is as follows:

> We favor an intelligent system of improving the arid lands of the West, storing the waters for purposes of irrigation, and the holding of such lands for actual settlers.

The gentleman from Indiana says that this is not an intelligent system of irrigation, but refers to a bill which I introduced in the Fifty-fourth Congress, which was a partial measure to let these States do the work of erecting and building reservoirs within their respective limits. Mr. Speaker, when we take into consideration the wording of this platform, it can be seen that it was the intention of that political party in that convention not to indorse that kind of a proposition, because it provided that "said lands shall be held for actual settlers;" and if these lands were ceded to the States by the National Government, I would like to know how the nation could hold them for actual settlers. Consequently the statement which the gentleman makes that they had in mind a bill which I had introduced and which was favorably reported by the Committee on Public Lands is flatly contradicted in the very declaration of the platform itself.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield for just one question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does not the gentleman know that Congress could provide as a condition precedent to the acceptance of those lands the actual holding of them for the settlers?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but was there anything provided in that bill that they should hold them for actual settlers? No, sir; not a syllable. Besides, as I stated in the report upon that bill, it would be better for the National Government to undertake it, but I felt at that time, with the public sentiment against us, that we could not get the relief.

Mr. Speaker, I tried to get consideration of that bill. It is true Speaker Reed recognized me to call up the measure, but objections were made to its consideration; objections even were made to setting a day for its consideration, and those objections were based upon the ground that the United States should not cede lands to the States for any such purpose. It seems that when we get a bill up here to grant lands to the States to be used in reclaiming arid lands, then somebody objects to it and says the National Government should hold and should keep control of the lands so as to give actual settlers the right to locate upon the public domain, and when we report a bill that is in favor of giving to the National Governm ent the power ofconstructing these irrigation works, then we find gentlemen, like the gentleman from Indiana, saying that is not the way to do it, but we should give these lands to the States to be used for that purpose. No matter what position we take we find some people ready to prevent the development of that Western country.

Mr. Speaker, the reasons which the gentleman from Indiana has given against the merits of the bill alone impel me at this time to say a word in relation to the merits of this measure. This bill is one which, if a conservative measure can be considered at all, if a conservative measure with relation to arid lands can be indorsed at all, should receive the approval of this House. The provisions of the bill are in substance that out of the proceeds of the sale of public lands of the arid-land States there shall be created a reclamation fund in the Treasury of the United States, and from that reclamation fund irrigation works shall be built.

After they are completed the cost of the construction shall be divided among the acres of land that can be irrigated from these works, and before anyone can acquire title from the United States to the reclaimed land he must pay into the Treasury of the United States every dollar of the cost of the construction of those works. Talk to me about that being an extravagant measure! Say to me that that is not a conservative measure! Mr. Speaker, it seems to me if any measure on earth could be indorsed, if we are going to develop that Western country in any manner, this is the bill which should meet the approval of every man in this House.

The conditions in the West are simply these: Under the guidance of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW], a man whom every Western man in this country loves and reveres, the homestead law was enacted. Mr. Speaker, it did not contemplate the settlement of arid lands. It contemplated the settlement of lands that received sufficient precipitation from the clouds to raise ordinary crops. Early in the settlement of the arid region the farmers found that they could take up their 160 acres of public land close to a stream, and by going up a mile or two, dig a ditch and conduct the water, at small expense, to their land, thereby availing themselves of the land laws of the United States with relation to settlement; but those lands in my State have long since been taken up.

The result is that now you can not find any public lands except where it is necessary to go 20 miles up the stream in order to conduct the water thereof to the land. The cost of doing that is more than a hundred times the value of the land. Consequently, it means that no settlement can take place in that country unless some measure is perfected for the completing of large works and reservoirs. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the condition of that country. It means that development must absolutely stop in agriculture unless we are able to get some legislative relief. It is on that account that this bill has been considered, not only by the West, but even by Eastern people, and has met their approval. A condition confronts us in the West to-day that you gentlemen can not appreciate. It is estimated that this very year 50,000 Americans have gone across the border into Canada for the purpose of locating upon the cheap lands of the Dominion.

Are you going to retain your own citizens here or are you going to prefer the development of Canada to the development of your own country, especially when the development of your own country does not take one dollar out of the Treasury of the United States? Ah, Mr. Speaker, there can be but one answer to that. That flow of immigration from the Western States to Canada has occurred solely because there they can get the benefit of cheap land, which receives sufficient rain to raise ordinary crops, while in the United States the available lands are arid. Let us stand for the development of our own country instead of that of a foreign people.

So, Mr. Speaker, we find that something must be done in this matter; that it is necessary to the development of the West; that it is necessary to the building up of this nation and making it the greatest country of the world.

But, Mr. Speaker, as I see that my time is rapidly passing, that I have only about one minute left, I want to say that this talk as to the merits of the bill is not germane now. The only question now before the House is whether we shall give consideration to this measure. No word has been said against that, and I can not see how any man can justify a vote against consideration of a measure that has received the approval of the President, innumerable chambers of commerce, and a large number of labor organizations, and the express commendation of the great political parties of this country, expressed by resolution in national convention.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the House would immediately adopt this rule and that we would proceed to debate the pending irrigation bill pursuant to its terms; but the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], on the consideration of this rule, has seen fit to arraign his party associates upon this side of the House, his party associates on the Committee on Rules, his party associates on the Committee on Irrigation, his party associates on the Democratic Congressional campaign committee, and has seen fit to assure this side of the House that all these gentlemen have been deceived into the support of a purely Republican policy and a purely Republican measure which has the advocacy and support of President Roosevelt.

Now, I contend, Mr. Speaker, that this is a nonpartisan measure; that it is in harmony with the platforms of all parties in the last campaign; that it is in harmony with the enlightened sentiment of the country, which has gradually been formulating itself upon this subject and which found its expression in the party platforms.

It is also in harmony with the opinion of the Senators and Representatives from the arid and semiarid States and Territories regardless of politics. Every Senator and every Representative from that great region has supported this measure.

Now, the gentleman insists that we have been driven by the President into this report of a Republican measure. Let me give the gentleman the history of this measure. For years the arid States have been insisting upon some action by the Federal Government in reference to the arid public lands, composing as they do in some States 95 per cent of their entire area, and they have been insisting that it is the duty of the Government to prepare these lands for settlement, so that the States in which they are located may become populated.

They urged for a long time the cession of these lands to the States. But Congress, regarding this great public domain as a public trust, not to be lightly turned over to sparsely settled States to be managed according to the judgment or lack of judgment, the discretion or indiscretion, the honesty or dishonesty, the providence or improvidence, of State legislatures, regarding it as a heritage for the entire Union, to be preserved for our unborn millions, has refused in its wisdom a cession to the States. So, at last, after the subject had been debated in and out of Congress for twenty years or more, the two parties in 1896 met in their respective conventions and formulated their expression on this subject, almost identical in terms—certainly identical in spirit.

Both parties declared in favor of the reclamation of these arid lands by the National Government and the holding of such lands for actual settlers, and in so declaring they but followed the general sentiment of the country, which was against any abandonment of its trust by the National Government and its surrender to the States.

As soon as that campaign was over I sought to shape a measure which would be in harmony with the two platforms and in harmony with the general sentiment of the country. At the last session of Congress, and before Mr. Roosevelt came into power, I introduced a bill which was the result of careful study of legislation prior to that time, and of consultation with the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Director of Geological Survey, the chief hydrographer of the Survey, the chairman of the National Irrigation Association, and other well-informed and experienced men on this subject.

Its purpose was to present a settlement of the entire question, to relieve the Treasury of the United States of any burden and simply to devote the proceeds of the sales of lands in the arid regions to the conservation of flood waters, so as to make the waters available for settlers, who would do the actual work of reclamation. The purpose was to present a comprehensive plan, which would impose no burden on the taxpayers of the country, which would enable the West to reclaim itself, and which would preserve this vast domain for home builders, and save it from concentrated and monopolistic holdings.

And if the gentleman will examine that bill—introduced in Congress before Mr. Roosevelt became President—he will find that it is identical in its provisions, though differing somewhat in phraseology, with the bill which is now before us for consideration. That bill, after its introduction, was presented to a meeting of Western men, regardless of party—Democrats and Republicans and Populists—and received their approval, and they requested Senator HANSBROUGH, chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, to introduce it in the Senate.

This was all in the short session of the last Congress, and there was not sufficient time to obtain consideration of the measure. Later on, after Mr. Roosevelt came into power, he made a recommendation in his message to this Congress substantially in line with the bill of which I have spoken. Shortly after this the Senators and Representatives from 13 States and 3 Territories, constituting the arid region, met together and appointed a committee of 17, regardless of party, to frame and present for their approval an irrigation measure.

They met and after prolonged meetings lasting over a month they agreed upon a bill, which was later on approved at a general meeting of the Senators and Representatives from the arid and semiarid States, regardless of party; and these Senators and Representatives instructed Senator HANSBROUGH, a Republican, to introduce it in the Senate, and myself, a Democrat, to introduce it in the House, thus securing nonpartisan action. It was referred to the committees of the Senate and House and was reported favorably.

It passed in the Senate by a unanimous vote, and then President Roosevelt, who is entirely familiar with that region and knows its wants, invited in consultation some members of the Irrigation Committee of the House, regardless of party. He was somewhat in doubt as to whether the bill was sufficiently guarded in the interest of homeseekers.

It was a question simply of construction. We all wanted to preserve that domain in small tracts for actual settlers and homebuilders. We all wanted to prevent monopoly and concentration of ownership, and the result was that certain changes were made absolutely satisfactory both to the Executive and to the Irrigation Committee, and intended only to carry out the intentions of both.

And let me say to the gentleman from Indiana, lest he charge that our action was the result of Executive dictation, that these changes were absolutely in harmony with the original bill, which I had introduced before Mr. Roosevelt succeeded to the Presidency, and with the platform of both parties.

Now, the gentleman refers to the Congressional campaign committee of the Democratic party as having assumed a jurisdiction that did not belong to it. Who pretends that the Democratic Congressional committee has a right to bind the conscience and mind of any member of its party on this floor?

But when the Democratic members from the entire region affected, and all the Democratic members of the Irrigation Committee of the House, and the Democratic members of the Committee on Rules were in favor of this measure as one in harmony with the party pledge in the national platform, it was the privilege and right of the Democratic Congressional campaign committee to express its views on the subject, and it did so, without a dissenting voice, in the following words:

Whereas the Democratic platform of 1900 declared as follows:

"We favor an intelligent system of improving the arid lands of the West, storing the waters for the purpose of irrigation, and the holding of such lands for actual settlers:" Now, therefore,

Resolved by the Democratic Congressional Committee, That we regard the pending bill for the irrigation of the arid lands of the West, which devotes the proceeds of the sales of public lands in the arid and semiarid States and Territories to the construction of storage and irrigation works, and makes each project self-compensatory by fixing the cost on the lands to be reclaimed, to be repaid by the settlers in ten annual installments, and also reserves the land so reclaimed for actual settlers and home builders, as complying with the pledge contained in the national Democratic platform, and we therefore favor the passage of said bill as a needed step in the line of domestic development.

I do not pretend for a moment that the action of the Democratic Congressional committee is binding upon any member of this House; but I do say that it is a persuasive utterance, indicating the opinion of Democrats upon this floor and engaged in important party work regarding a measure which has received the sanction of every Democratic member of the Committee on Irrigation and which will, I believe, receive the almost unanimous support of this side of the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I regret that the gentleman has raised the cry of party regarding a measure which is nonpartisan and which meets simply the platform requirements of both parties. I regret that we are limited in the time afforded for debate. I do not think the Committee on Rules responsible for that at all. Their intention was to give us three days, but the exigencies of public business required the cutting off of one day.

I wish to say that there is not a man from the arid regions who is not willing to meet the opponents of this measure in the forum of debate, and we appeal to the intelligent judgment of the entire House, and we Democrats on the Irrigation Committee appeal to the intelligent judgment of the members on this side of the House, as to whether this bill is not a wise and comprehensive measure, presenting an intelligent system, without expense to the General Government, for the reclamation of the arid lands, aiding the West to reclaim itself by the machinery afforded by this law, and, above all, holding that vast area for the unborn generations, generations to be born in your States of the East, in your States of the Middle West, and in your States of the South, to be held as a heritage for the entire people, North, South, East, and West, and to be dedicated forever to American home building, the true foundation of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

STATUE TO THE LATE MAJ. GEN. WILLIAM J. SEWELL.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the immediate consideration of the order which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the Senate be requested to furnish the House of Representatives a duplicate copy of the joint resolution (S. R. 100) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish condemned cannon for an equestrian statue of the late Maj. Gen. William J. Sewell, United States Volunteers, the same having been lost or misplaced.

The order was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

IRRIGATION OF ARID LANDS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 3057) appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the gentleman withhold his motion? I want to ask for leave to print on this debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 3057.

Mr. MONDELL. And pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] may control the time against the bill, and that I may control the time in favor of the bill.

The SPEAKER. And pending that motion, the gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may control the time in favor of the bill, and that the gentleman from New York may control the time in opposition to the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all who may speak on the bill may have ten days to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming also asks unanimous consent that all who speak on this bill may have ten days in which to extend remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion of Mr. MONDELL was then agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TAWNEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 3057, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 3057) appropriating the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands in certain States and Territories to the construction of irrigation works for the reclamation of arid lands.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this is a most important measure, a measure that is entitled to a very considerable length of time for consideration, but owing to the lateness of the session and the pressure of other public business, those interested in the measure have agreed to accept a rule providing only two days for consideration. It will therefore be necessary to be brief in the remarks which I may make on the subject, in order to give other gentlemen who desire to address the House an opportunity to do so.

A hundred years ago the enlightened statesmanship and prophetic vision of Thomas Jefferson overcame his misgivings as to certain limitations of the Federal Constitution and, illuminating that great instrument by the light of national destiny, constrained him to become the champion of the acquisition of the great province of Louisiana, which nearly doubled the territory under our flag. Then came the settlements and treaties which gave us the country "where rolls the Oregon," and later the uprising of Texas and the war with Mexico, which resulted in completing the expansion of our territory in a compact body westward to the Pacific and from the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude to the Gulf of California.

The greatest internal problem of our first century of national life was that of binding together and bringing into close touch this tremendously extended and largely undeveloped territory and its widely scattered peoples, and in the accomplishment of that all-important consummation the establishment of a system of intercommunication by land and water was imperative and essential.

As the acquisition of Louisiana and other Western territory was in the face of much misgiving and not a little open protest on the part of some of our statesmen, so the solution of the problems of intercommunication, the importance of which the acquisition of that territory vastly increased, was only accomplished after the modification of certain views of constitutional limitations, and a keen appreciation of the unanswerable logic of our situation gradually led to a general acceptance of that view which not only commended but commanded Government appropriations for the improvement of interstate rivers and waterways and land-grant bonuses and cash loans for the construction of railways to bind together with pathways of steel the widely separated boundaries of the Republic.

In spite of the qualms and questionings of the strict constructionists of other days, I doubt if there dwells within the Republic to-day anyone who doubts the wisdom of that policy, in view of its beneficent results, which gave Government aid and credit to the solution of the problems of land and water communication, the lack of which more than once in our history caused misgivings with regard to our territorial integrity and interposed a serious barrier to our growth and development.

Happily for our people, the acute problems of intercommunication of our first century of national life have been solved. All portions of our country have been brought closely together by water communication, where possible, and by railway and telegraph.

Government aid having blazed the pathway for the iron horse, is no longer needed in that direction, but Government appropriations demanded by our largely increasing internal trade are more lavish than ever for the establishment and betterment of internal waterways and have even been extended to liberal appropriations for the protection of private property along the courses of great streams and for the purpose of furnishing facilities for purely local transportation by water.

IRRIGATION THE PARAMOUNT INTERNAL QUESTION.

As the first century of our national existence has seen the solution of the problems of transportation and intercommunication, the second century presents to us as the paramount internal question that of making available for human use and occupancy the vast areas which the fathers of our territorial expansion, with some misgivings and questionings, but with a patriotic hope which has been fully justified, added to our territory, and which national aid to the construction and betterment of lines of communication have brought together into a closely welded, mutually interdependent, and homogeneous whole.

Up to the time of the acquisition of Louisiana all of our territory was within the humid region, where crops suited to the climate and the soil could be readily produced by the clearing of the forests, and upon our vast extent of prairies in the Mississippi Valley by the turning of the sod and the planting of the seed; but the acquisition of the Western territory brought us face to face with a new problem, that of reclaiming the vast areas of arid lands and making them habitable, though it is true that neither the statesmen responsible for our early expansion or the hardy pioneers who first located in or explored the new region understood or appreciated the practicability or possibility of such reclamation.

Brought face to face with irrigation as crudely practiced by the Indians of the Southwest, and more intelligently by the Spaniards of the Pacific coast, our people regarded it more as one of the curiosities of an extraordinary climate and the peculiar practices of a strange people than an industry worthy of development, and, idle curiosity gratified, it was dismissed from mind as a unique and somewhat useful industry forced by local conditions, the practice of which might properly be left to the Indian and the greaser.

It is perhaps not strange that this should have been so, for of all the great peoples who have at one time or another dominated the earth's surface, established governments, founded institutions and systems of laws the Anglo-Saxon alone in the beginning of his racial development escaped the necessity of applying methods of irrigation to the soil in order to make it productive. The cradle of every other great race has been rocked by the invigorating breezes of an arid climate and lulled by the soft murmur of canal-borne waters; but the Celt, the Briton, and the Saxon occupied a territory watered by the rain of heaven, and not only had no practice, but lacked even legend or tradition of irrigation. On the contrary, they laid down and established a rule of law relative to rights in water essentially fatal to the development of irrigation, a rule peculiar to the race and differing from that of all the balance of the world. In a land of generous downpour, they developed the theory which expressed the idea that the rivers drain the lands, make them fit for cultivation and habitation, and run to the sea; therefore let them run unobstructed and unimpeded, while practically all the balance of the world established laws and customs in conformity with the truth that waters fructify and quicken life; therefore they should be diverted and applied to the soil to redeem the arid and increase the fruitage of the humid lands.

As the time passed, however, and considerable numbers of people were attracted into our arid region by the building of lines of communication, in search of minerals, to engage in stock raising, and other industries, the pioneer was attracted to the necessity as well as the possibility of development by irrigation, and he set about a practical demonstration thereof with characteristic energy. A people bound together by the fervor of a new faith, seeking a home in the Western wilderness, pitched their tabernacle within sight of the waters of the Great Salt Lake, and compelled by the necessities of their situation to begin the systematic development of extensive irrigation projects, by energetic cooperative efforts demonstrated anew what the western world had almost forgotten—that extensive areas may be developed and made to sustain a large population under irrigated agriculture.

THE EARLY DAYS OF IRRIGATION IN THE WEST.

In the early days of irrigation in the West only the waters of the smaller swift-flowing streams were utilized, as from these water was easily and cheaply diverted and applied to the lands of the adjacent valleys. As railroads were built and population pressed forward from the humid regions, attracted by the climate and resources of the country, the mining and trading centers grew into cities and towns and the demand for agricultural products increased. From this increased demand there came slowly an increased knowledge of the agricultural and horticultural possibilities of the region under irrigation, and gradually larger, more difficult, and more expensive enterprises were planned and executed, utilizing not only the natural flow of streams but waters conserved by storage as well, until practically every stream of any size in the arid region has been levied upon to a greater or less extent by the irrigator.

Slow as we were as a people to appreciate and understand the benefits of irrigation when its advantages and its necessity over a large portion of our country became clearly apparent, we took hold of the subject with characteristic energy and enterprise, and long before all of the wonderfully fertile humid lands of the Mississippi Valley had been settled and developed the Western pioneer began the conquest of the desert. Neither physical obstacles nor inherited water laws fatal to irrigation could long withstand his energy or stand in the way of progress. The one he overcame; the other he abrogated or modified, with the result that, taking into consideration the beginning, our progress has been reasonably satisfactory.

Up to this time there have been irrigated in the United States about seven and a half million acres, an area about equal to the combined land areas of New Jersey and Connecticut, or Maryland and Delaware, and distributed as follows:

State or Territory.	Acres.	State or Territory.	Acrer.
Arizona	185,396	North Dakota	5,202
California	1,446,119	Oregon	388,198
Colorado	1,611,271	Oklahoma	2,761
Idaho	602,548	South Dakota	43,010
Kansas	26,497	Utah	639,273
Montana	970,231	Washington	135,936
Nebraska	148,538	Wyoming	606,942
Nevada	504,168
New Mexico	204,508	Total	7,510,598

This area, while not large as compared with the area which can ultimately be irrigated, is larger than the irrigated area of any other country save that of India. While it is only one-fourth as large as the irrigated acreage of that country, it is one-fourth larger than that of Egypt, where irrigation has been practiced for thousands of years.

WHY THE GOVERNMENT MUST UNDERTAKE THE WORK.

So far our irrigation development has been practically all the result of private enterprise, and in presenting this measure, which proposes certain undertakings by the National Government, the first query would naturally be, Why not continue development as in the past? Why call on the National Government to enter a field which so far has been entirely the theater of individual effort?

In the first place, it should be remembered, as I have stated, that the works so far undertaken have been largely of a simple character, presenting few engineering difficulties and intended only to supply single farms or limited areas of country. Where conditions of soil, climate, markets, and the possibility of producing tropical and semitropical products have seemed to warrant, larger enterprises have been undertaken, and in some instances these enterprises have been expensive, intricate, and difficult, but unfortunately they have not in all instances been financially successful, owing largely to inability to control the lands watered and to apportion against and collect from them the benefit which they derived from the project.

It is not claimed that the limit of successful irrigation by private enterprise has been reached, nor is it intended by this legislation to usurp the proper and legitimate field of private enterprise, but rather to undertake works of such character and magnitude as under our land system private enterprise can neither successfully nor to the best interests of the people properly undertake. However, while it is hoped that private enterprise will still continue to carry on the work of irrigation reclamation and accomplish much, yet we have reached a point in the development by irrigation—in portions of the West where irrigation is the most needed, where there is the most urgent demand for it, where the irrigated lands will be the most valuable—where public agencies must be invoked before there can be any further considerable harmonious or proper development.

This situation is the result of a number of causes. Any irrigation enterprise to be successful must have a market for its wares. The projector of irrigation works must be assured that the lands proposed to be irrigated will bear the burden of the expense, and where the lands to be irrigated are wholly or largely public lands, subject to entry under laws which do not require reclamation, it is impossible for the private investor to secure this assurance. While the rumor of the probable construction of an irrigating ditch by private enterprise is generally sufficient to cause all the land irrigable therefrom to be immediately entered under the various land laws, unfortunately these entries, in a very great many cases, are not made with the purpose or expectation of purchasing water rights and irrigating the land, but largely with the hope of realizing on the increased value of the land after the construction of the ditch.

In other cases the entryman secures more land than is necessary for the support of his family or than he can afford to buy a water right for, and, the tenure or right of the company or association conveying the water being always limited, the incentive to the settler is to delay the purchase of the right to use water in the hope of making a better bargain later. Under this condition of affairs it is inevitable that the ditch builder should fail to realize a profit, oftentimes lose his investment, or be compelled to the alternative of securing, oftentimes by becoming a party to a violation of the spirit if not the letter of the land laws, title to the lands to be irrigated and applying the water with the hope of afterwards disposing of them.

It is true that the condition of affairs here outlined could be partially overcome by conveying large tracts of land to private individuals on the pledge of their reclamation, but this system, while violating every principle of American land policy, which has always been to provide homes on small farms to actual settlers on the public domain, would be open to the further criticism that it would not result in the reclamation of the land in the majority of cases.

Another serious obstacle to the undertaking of the larger and more intricate irrigation works by private enterprise lies in the fact that private enterprise must always look for a profit on its investment, and where an irrigation enterprise requires a considerable number of years for its complete development, interest charges become a very serious item, while the Government, interested only in the settlement of the lands, can well forego any interest on investments and be content with the return of the principal. Private enterprise, to be successful and command capital, must pay interest on the investment from the start, and thus many an enterprise which might ultimately have proven successful has been a disappointing failure because the first few years after its inauguration it failed to yield returns.

There is a certain class of irrigation works which not only are disappointing when constructed by private enterprise, owing to the difficulty of fixing and collecting the charges upon all the public lands benefited, but which by reason of their effect upon the flow of streams and therefore their importance to a large number of users, oftentimes in different States, should always be under public control. These are the large reservoirs and storage works at the headwaters and along the courses of streams, constructed for the purpose of impounding flood waters with a view of utilizing them to increase the flow of streams in the latter portion of the irrigation season, when under natural conditions they are the lowest—in other words, works to regulate stream flow.

Works of this character should never be in the control of individuals; and while it is exceedingly difficult where the lands benefited by them are largely public lands for private enterprise to secure returns on their investments in this class of work, even if that were possible, they should no more be controlled by individuals or corporations than should the entrance to a harbor or the mouth of a navigable river be so controlled.

It has been suggested that if private enterprise can not properly develop large irrigation systems the work might be undertaken by the respective States. There are many reasons why the States are not so well equipped to carry on this work as the Federal Government. In the first place, were the work carried on by the States, the disposition would be to utilize all of the waters flowing through a State within the State, provided there was no prior appropriation lower down on the stream, regardless of the most beneficial and economical development of the irrigation possibilities of the entire region. Further, the constitutions of some of the States forbid the undertaking of works of internal improvement; and even were the States the proper agency through which to carry on this development, none of the States in the arid region are financially able to do so.

It should be remembered that in the arid region the Government is the owner at this time of from 60 to 92 per cent of all the lands, and it is from the proceeds of the sales of these lands that it is proposed by the bill under consideration to provide for the reclamation of the irrigable portion thereof, and the National Government as the owner of the lands has a source of revenue the States do not possess. The States have no such source of revenue, and with only 8 to 40 per cent of their lands taxable and without large accumulations of wealth and personal property as sources of revenue, it is utterly impossible for them to secure funds with which to inaugurate the work.

The relative amount of lands reserved, subject to entry and in private ownership, in the States and Territories named in the bill are as follows:

State or Territory.	In private ownership.	Reserved.	Subject to entry.	Total.	Amount in public ownership.
	Acres.	Acres.	Acres.	Acres.	Per cent.
Arizona	5,736,258	18,285,008	48,771,054	72,792,320	92

THE URGENCY OF THE WORK.

Admitting, then, that the proper development of the arid region, under the present conditions, can only be undertaken and accomplished by the National Government, it seems to me that there should be no diversity of opinion as to the duty of the Government in the matter or as to the propriety and advisability of beginning this work in the near future, for I take it for granted that all will admit that it is not in keeping with sound public policy or enlightened statesmanship to delay or retard a reasonable and legitimate development of the agricultural possibilities of the arid portion of our country.

There is a crying need for the beginning of this work at once. In many parts of the West, where there is a demand for homes, private enterprise can go no further until the National Government shall have carried out certain initial works. In other parts of the West the lands are being slowly absorbed by those who are making ineffectual attempts against too great odds to carry on the work of irrigation unaided, or by others anxious to control large bodies of land for grazing purposes, and the work should be inaugurated before this sort of absorption has gone too far. Indeed, the urgency of the inauguration of the work of national irrigation has been apparent to every student of the subject for years, and agitation and effort to that end has, as everyone here knows, been for some time constant and continuous.

THE POLITICAL PARTIES ON IRRIGATION.

The great political parties of the country have not been unmindful of the duty of the National Government in this direction, and have declared in no uncertain terms on the subject, as follows:

REPUBLICAN PLATFORM OF 1900.

In further pursuance of the constant policy of the Republican party to provide free homes on the public domain, we recommend adequate national legislation to reclaim the arid lands of the United States, reserving control of the distribution of water for irrigation to the respective States and Territories.

As the Republican party has a well-earned reputation for the complete and speedy fulfillment of its pledges, we confidently expect that this measure, which is in harmony with the promise of the party, will receive the support of all the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber.

The Democratic platform of 1900 contains the declaration:

We favor an intelligent system of improving the arid lands of the West, storing the waters for the purposes of irrigation, and the holding of such lands for actual settlers.

Our friends on the other side are to be congratulated on having made one pledge in their last national platform which can be fulfilled with honor to themselves and glory to the country, and therefore I am confident they will all vote for the measure.

THE PRESIDENT ON IRRIGATION.

No American President has ever been more thoroughly conversant with the conditions in and the needs of all portions of our country than President Roosevelt, and certainly none have been more heartily in sympathy with the hopes, aims, and aspirations of our people of all sections than he. In his message to Congress he voiced a statesmanlike breadth of view and indicated a masterful grasp of the great questions before our people for solution. In that notable state paper he gave especial prominence to the question of irrigation, and wrote partly as follows:

It is as right for the National Government to make the streams and rivers of the arid region useful by engineering works for water storage as to make useful the rivers and harbors of the humid region by engineering works of another kind. The storing of the floods in reservoirs at the headwaters of our rivers is but an enlargment of our present policy of river control, under which levees are built on the lower reaches of the same streams.

* * * * * * *

These irrigation works should be built by the National Government. The lands reclaimed by them should be reserved by the Government for actual settlers, and the cost of construction should so far as possible be repaid by the land reclaimed. The distribution of the water, the division of the streams among irrigators, should be left to the settlers themselves in conformity with State laws, and without interference with those laws or with vested rights.

* * * * * * *

The reclamation and settlement of the arid lands will enrich every portion of our country, just as the settlement of the Ohio and Mississippi valleys brought prosperity to the Atlantic States. The increased demand for manufactured articles will stimulate industrial production, while wider home markets and the trade of Asia will consume the larger food supplies and effectually prevent Western competition with Eastern agriculture. Indeed, the products of irrigation will be consumed chiefly in upbuilding local centers of mining and other industries, which would otherwise not come into existence at all. Our people as a whole will profit, for successful home making is but another name for the upbuilding of the nation.

The present Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior as well have borne testimony to the importance, from a national standpoint, of the questions of the development of the arid West, while scientists, students, business men, organized labor have all voiced their belief in the advisability of the undertaking by the Federal Government of the construction of certain classes of work for the purpose of building up homes and establishing communities in the regions now largely desolate and uninhabited.

At the beginning of the present session of Congress the Representatives from the 16 States and Territories embraced within the arid and semiarid portion of our country, believing that the time was ripe to present to the Congress a comprehensive plan of national undertaking of irrigation enterprise, formed a committee of 17 members, composed of Representatives and Senators from the region referred to, and this committee set about the formulation of a measure for the consideration of Congress. Most careful consideration was given to every detail of the proposed legislation, and after much discussion the measure was formulated and introduced in either House. Criticisms and suggestions were made relative to it, and as to the effect or intent of certain of its provisions, and after further thought and discussion the measure was finally amended in a way satisfactory, it is believed, to all of those favorable to national irrigation legislation and presented for your consideration. In my opinion no measure has ever been presented to this House more carefully thought out, and certainly no legislation has ever been presented to an American Congress which so carefully and faithfully safeguards the interests of the home builder. It is a step in advance of any legislation we have ever had in guarding against the possibility of speculative land holdings and in providing for small farms and homes on the public land, while it will also compel the division into small holdings of any large areas which may be in private ownership which may be irrigated under its provisions.

IRRIGATION NO EXPERIMENT.

In presenting to Congress this irrigation measure we are urging no experiment and exploiting no new theories. While we may have some doubts as to the truth in other fields of the old adage that "there is no new thing new under the sun," no student of irrigation will deny its axiomatic character with regard to that ancient and honorable art, and this applies not only to the central ideal—that of reclamation by irrigation of arid lands—but as well and as forcibly to the principles which underlie this measure, the policies which it outlines, the detail of administration which it provides. There is in it all no new thing. National expenditure, local administration, principles underlying and governing water rights, provisions insuring small individual holdings; all of them have been tested and worked out in widely separated regions under varying conditions since the very dawn of human history.

Twenty-seven centuries before the star above Bethlehem guided the wise men across the plains of Judea the government of the great King Menes built a mighty canal from the Nile and began the vast irrigation system which was the foundation of ancient Egypt's power and glory. Four thousand times has this good old earth swung around the fiery furnace of the sun since King Moreis in the development of that system constructed the first storage reservoir, and on the irrigated lands thus provided was developed that remarkable civilization whose great works are, after the lapse of all the centuries, the wonder of the world. In the very dawn of her history Assyria constructed irrigation works and converted the sterile valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris into fertile fields. Of all the mighty works of ancient Babylon none were so remarkable as her great artificial lakes and her irrigating canals hundreds of feet in breadth and hundreds of miles in length.

Rome carried with her victorious banners the art of irrigation all over the country; she swept from Africa to the British Isles, and built as permanently her water courses as she did her military roads.

The Moors found irrigation one of the established arts when they invaded Spain. Like wise men that they were, they perfected it. No man knows when irrigation was first practiced in India, though the lamentable history of a temporary decline in the practice of the art is written in awful records of famine and starvation. Fortunately later rulers of India have appreciated the fact that in irrigation lay the salvation of the vast population of that land, and nearly seventy-five years ago they began the construction of those great works of irrigation which have entirely put an end to famine in the region irrigated and greatly modified its rigors in all parts of the country.

To enumerate the regions where irrigation is now practiced is practically to name every important populous country on the globe, with the exception of some parts of northern Europe and Asia. Japan, China, Siam, Korea, Ceylon, India, Afghanistan, Turkey, Greece, Italy, Spain, France, Egypt and all the States of Northern Africa, Madagascar, South Africa, Australia, South America, and Mexico. In most of the countries enumerated the story of irrigation runs back to the very twilight of history, and in all of them the principles of irrigation have been more or less successfully worked out and crystallized into custom, regulation, and statute.

NO COMPREHENSIVE IRRIGATION EXCEPT THROUGH PUBLIC AGENCIES.

In all the history of irrigated agriculture, extending over a period of over four thousand years, no complete and comprehensive development by irrigation has been undertaken or accomplished except through public or semipublic agencies. The wisdom of the universal practice of mankind in this respect, under widely differing physical conditions and forms of law and government is abundantly demonstrated by our experience, beginning as it did in purely private undertakings, leading up through a gradual strengthening of the theory of public control of water used in irrigation to a realization of the necessity of public undertaking and control of certain classes of the works of irrigation.

A study of our conditions will convince any well wisher of his country that the beginning of a more systematic development of our arid region has been quite long enough delayed. In the thirty years between 1870 and 1900 we added to our cultivated area at the rate of between five and six million acres per annum. During that period the annual increase in the acreage planted to the three staples of wheat, corn, and oats alone was about three and one-half million acres per annum. For the future, our increases in cultivated area in the humid region of the country will only be such as is brought about by increased demand for agricultural products.

Of the public domain it may be said without fear of successful contradiction that there is left practically no considerable areas of agricultural land capable of producing good crops every year without artificial irrigation. It is true that in some parts of the Northwest there are limited areas of land which when cleared or drained will make fair farming land. There are scattered here and there throughout the arid region favorably situated districts limited in extent where under careful cultivation fair crops of certain varieties of agricultural produce may be grown by what is called dry farming. But these areas are widely scattered, and if we search all of the public domain, outside of Alaska, for land upon which any classes of agricultural crops can be successfully grown by dependence on natural rainfall after expensive preparation or by careful tillage, the sum total of all these lands could not by the most liberal estimate exceed in amount 15,000,000 acres, this being equal to the area which we have been adding to our cultivated lands every three years in the last thirty and the final searching out, entry, preparation and utilization of the widely scattered tracts comprising this aggregate is a matter not of a few years, but of a generation at least.

The future additions to the farming lands of the country, then, so far as such additions shall come from the public lands, must be almost entirely from lands made available by irrigation.

We are now a nation of 76,000,000 people, increasing at the rate of 1,500,000 annually. When we had less than half our present population it was considered wise to provide opportunities for the establishment of homes on the public land. The wisdom of that policy has been abundantly demonstrated. Now that the fertile humid public lands have been practically all absorbed, to oppose legislation which has for its object the establishment of homes on the arid public domain and provide for our rapidly increasing population is to question the wisdom of the policy which we have hitherto pursued.

In order to meet the arguments and objections which have been offered to the general scheme of Government aid to the arid West, or to this measure in particular, it will be necessary and proper to consider the general plan and scope as well as the detail of the bill under consideration.

THE PROVISIONS OF THE BILL.

The bill (S. 3057) I will discuss in its amended form as presented to the House for its consideration. In the first place, this bill proposes that the proceeds from the sales of public lands in Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming, less the amounts earned by registers and receivers of land offices and the 5 per cent due to States, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, shall be set aside as a special fund in the Treasury, to be called the reclamation fund, to be used in the examination, survey, construction, and maintenance of irrigation works.

The unreserved public lands in the States and Territories named which become the basis of the fund, according to the terms of the bill, amount to about 535,000,000 acres. The proceeds from the sales of lands for the two fiscal years 1901 and 1902, which will be available soon after the passage of the bill, will aggregate something over $6,000,000—a fair sum with which to begin work—and it is estimated that the immediate annual income under the provisions of the bill will be from $2,500,000 to $3,000,000. To be more accurate, the average annual income under the bill for the past three years would have been $2,633,198; the respective amounts for the various States and Territories named in the bill during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, have been as follows:

State or Territory.	Fiscal year.	Receipts.	State or Territory.	Fiscal year.	Receipts.
Arizona	1901	$42,586.16	North Dakota	1901	$449,025.43
California	1901	205,030.40	Oklahoma	1901	370,427.13
Colorado	1901	252,277.00	Oregon	1901	364,761.47
Idaho	1901	206,449.94	South Dakota	1901	113,475.22
Kansas	1901	20,182.22	Utah	1901	98,329.22
Montana	1901	367,130.10	Washington	1901	257,046.22
Nebraska	1901	103,040.49	Wyoming	1901	206,863.87
Nevada	1901	9,008.61
New Mexico	1901	75,091.83	Total	1901	3,140,725.31

The proceeds from the sales of public lands for the fiscal year 1901 were considerably higher than that for 1900, and the receipts for 1900 nearly a million higher than for 1899. The probability is that 1901 marked very nearly the high-water mark of public-land sales, and that the proceeds from the sales of public lands in the future will rather diminish than increase until such time as, under the operation of the bill, payments begin to be made on irrigated lands and from that time on receipts will increase as lands are irrigated and sold.

Section 2 of the bill provides for the making of surveys and examinations of proposed works and for report to Congress relative to same. Section 3 provides for withdrawal from public entry of lands required for any of the irrigation works and also for withdrawal, except from homestead entry of all lands to be irrigated. Section 4 provides for the construction of the works and for the apportioning of the cost of construction among the users of water upon the lands to be irrigated. Section 5 requires the entryman to irrigate his land, defines the terms and conditions under which land in private ownership may be irrigated and of the conditions of payments imposed on the settler on public lands and the water user on private lands. Section 6 provides for the form of local control and care of works by the settlers common in the irrigated country. Section 7 provides means for acquiring lands and water rights where same may be necessary.

Section 8 follows the well-established precedent in national legislation of recognizing local and State laws relative to the appropriation and distribution of water, and instructs the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out the provisions of the act to conform to these laws. This section also clearly recognizes the rule of prior appropriation which prevails in the arid region and, what is highly important, specifies the character of the water right which is provided for under the provisions of the act. Section 9 declares a policy of systematic and harmonious development of the irrigation possibilities of the arid region.

OPERATIONS UNDER THE MEASURE.

Having thus briefly outlined the provisions of the bill, I can perhaps best illustrate its workings by indicating how the Secretary of the Interior, as the agent of the Government under this act, would proceed. Should the bill become a law the Secretary of the Interior would proceed to make preliminary surveys and examinations in various portions of the arid region, utilizing, of course, the surveys which have already been made by the Government. These surveys and examinations would be made with a view of determining the most feasible and practicable projects, as well as those deemed, under all surrounding conditions, to be the most urgent.

The examinations would necessarily be of a variety of projects, including large diversions, and reservoir projects as well as projects combining both diversions and conservation of water. Before the beginning of the survey and examination of a project, or at such time during its progress as seemed advisable, the Secretary of the Interior would withdraw from entry the land required for the irrigation works, and by designation of the lands which it is proposed to irrigate they would be withdrawn from entry except under the homestead law, and become subject to all charges, conditions, and limitations of the act, should the project be constructed.

It having been ascertained that a sufficient supply of water for the irrigation of the lands in question was available and unappropriated and the feasibility of a project having been determined, the Secretary of the Interior would proceed to make the appropriation of the necessary water by giving the notice and complying with the forms of law of the State or Territory in which the works were located. He would then estimate the cost of the proposed works, and having determined upon their construction would advertise for bids for same, and would thereupon give notice of the limit of area per entry under the particular project, which limit under the provisions of the act would "represent the acreage which, in the opinion of the Secretary, may be reasonably required for the support of a family upon the lands in question. At the same time notice would be given of the charges to be made per acre upon each entry and upon lands in private ownership which might be irrigated by the waters of the works in question, which charges are to be determined with a view of returning to the reclamation fund the cost of construction, and be apportioned equitably."

The notice above referred to having been given, all entrymen on the lands proposed to be irrigated are bound by its provisions and all entries of the public lands subject thereto. The work of construction having been inaugurated, it is expected that settlers under a project would be able to secure employment thereon and thus support themselves until such times as water was available for their lands and crops could be produced. In order that settlers may have this opportunity of employment, it is provided that no Mongolian labor may be employed upon the works.

Under nearly every project undertaken by the Government there will undoubtedly be some lands in private ownership; and it would be manifestly unjust and inequitable not to provide water for these lands, providing their owners are willing to comply with the conditions of the act; and in order that no such lands may be held in large quantities or by nonresident owners it is provided that no water right for more than 160 acres shall be sold to any land owner, who must also be a resident or occupant of his land. This provision was drawn with a view of breaking up any large land holdings which might exist in the vicinity of the Government works and to insure occupancy by the owner of the land reclaimed.

As to the public lands, the entryman must not only reside upon his claim five years, but he must also irrigate at least half of it and make all the payments required before securing a patent to the same and a water right for its irrigation.

This is the first land law presented to Congress which has proposed the reduction of an agricultural entry to less than 160 acres and which required continuous residence upon the land for five years as a prerequisite to perfection of title.

No law ever presented to any legislative body has been so carefully drawn with a view of preventing the possibility of speculative ownership in lands, and I appeal to the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, the father of the House, the gentleman who is responsible for the homestead law, which did more to build up this nation than any law ever written on the statute book, in whose footsteps we have followed in providing a homestead for the arid as he did for the humid lands. I ask him, inasmuch as we have thrown further safeguards around the public lands than he felt necessary in his act, to heartily support this measure.

He made it possible to open up to settlement a limitless area of fair and fertile land, and the settler did not pay a penny for those lands. He gave the settler the opportunity to commute his holdings in twelve months, paying $1.25 an acre to secure full title. We provide that he shall go out on the desert on land now valueless and that he must reside there five years; pay the Government for its expenditure in bringing the water to the vicinity of his land before he can get a title.

Mr. GROW. If the gentleman will allow me, the original homestead act required them to occupy the land for five years.

Mr. MONDELL. I am delighted to know that and to have my attention called to it, because it shows that we have returned to the wisdom of my friend from Pennsylvania; we have returned to the original homestead proposition, and I trust that never more shall we depart from it.

WATER RIGHTS.

The main-line canals having been constructed by the Government, the entryman or landowner would proceed to the construction of such laterals as were necessary for the irrigation of his own tract and the preparation of the same to receive the water. The water having been beneficially applied and payments having been made under the provisions of the bill, the water right would become appurtenant to the land irrigated and inalienable therefrom. The water rights provided by the act are of that character which irrigation experience has demonstrated to be the most perfect.

The settler or landowner who complies with all the conditions of the act secures a perpetual right to the use of a sufficient amount of water to irrigate his land, but this right lapses if he fails to put the water to beneficial use and only extends to the use of the water on and for the tract originally irrigated. These most important provisions of the law prevent all the evils which come from recognizing a property right in water with power to sell and dispose of the same elsewhere and for other purposes than originally intended. This is an advance over the water usages of most of the States, and it is not denied that making water rights appurtenant to the tract irrigated will in some instances work hardship, but it is believed that it is much better to risk the individual hardships which will inevitably occur under a provision of appurtenance than to risk the evils certain to result from unlimited authority to transfer water rights.

Following the usual custom in the arid region, it is provided that when payments are made on a major portion of the lands to be irrigated from any project the management of and maintenance thereof, at their own expense, shall pass to the owners of the land irrigated, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and at this time the Government is relieved from all further expense in the maintenance of the distributing works.

Inasmuch, however, as it is deemed wise, for the present at least, that Congress shall have full control over storage reservoirs and works for the impounding of waters for the reason that works of this class affect a large number of water users—and there is always a possibility of the opportunity and advisability of increasing the capacity of such works—it has been provided that they shall remain for the present under the management and control of Congress, though the probability is that ultimately, when permanently established, it will be deemed wise and advisable to transfer them also to local control.

LOCAL CONTROL OF APPROPRIATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF WATER.

Every act since that of April 26, 1866, has recognized local laws and customs appertaining to the appropriation and distribution of water used in irrigation, and it has been deemed wise to continue our policy in this regard. It is not claimed that the State and Territorial laws relative to the use of water in irrigation are by any means perfect. The mistake was made in the early days of irrigation in some of the States of brushing aside and ignoring the ancient, just, and equitable Spanish and civil laws relative to the use of water and of recognizing beneath the brazen sky of a parched and arid region the theories of water developed in a tight little island soaked in a perennial downpour and enveloped in little less than perennial fog; but in spite of our bad beginning we have made wonderful progress in legislation and in practical rules andusages. The effect of the passage of this bill will be to further encourage improvements in local laws, rules, and regulations. They are now, it is believed, in every State and Territory in the arid region sufficient to fix and guard the rights under this bill.

Nothing is more important in an irrigation system than the character of the water right, and while some of the States in the region in question recognize rights differing from those provided in this act, rights of the character herein provided are recognized as being the best and are fully protected by the local laws and tribunals.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman without his consent, but I should like to ask him two or three questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. MONDELL. My time is very short, but I should like to answer the gentleman. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. One is upon the subject of national or State control.

Mr. MONDELL. I am very glad to answer that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will state both of them at once. The other is as to taking out of the Treasury of the United States, as I contend this bill provides for doing ultimately, of funds set aside for our agricultural colleges.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I will say to the gentleman, answering his last question first, that the funds for the support of agricultural colleges now come out of the United States Treasury if the proceeds from land sales are not sufficient for that purpose. Provision was made for that in the so-called free-homes bill, for which I hope the gentleman voted.

Now, as to State control over appropriation and distribution of water, I will say to the gentleman that there is no reasonable ground for disagreement on that point. We began to legislate in regard to the use of water in irrigation in 1866. We have legislated continuously along one line. The President in his message declared in conformity with all the legislation which had preceded. The Republican platform declared in conformity with that legislation.

The act of July 26, 1866 (14 Stat. L., 256; R. S., 2239), the first Federal legislation on the subject of rights to the use of water on the public domain, clearly recognized local control over such water in the following terms:

> Whenever by priority of possession rights to the use of water * * * have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of the courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same.

The act of July 9, 1870 (16 Stat. L., 218; R. S., 2340), confirmed the provisions of the statute of 1866, as follows:

> All patents granted or preemption or homesteads allowed shall be subject to any vested and accrued water rights, or rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water rights as may be recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and decisions of courts.

And the act of March 3, 1877 (19 Stat. L., 377), still further recognizes rights obtained under local laws, and fully recognizes the right of appropriation.

The act of March 6, 1891 (26 Stat., 1095, 1102), grants the right of way through the public land for the construction of reservoirs, canals, and ditches, provided that the privilege granted "shall not be construed to interfere with the control of water for irrigation and other purposes under the authority of the respective States or Territories."

The act of June 4, 1897 (30 Stat., 1136), referring to forest reserves, provides for the use of waters on such reserves "under the laws of the State wherein such forest reserves are situated."

There are several other acts of Congress recognizing the control of the States over the use of waters within their borders; one being the act of March 2, 1897, recognizing the control of the State of Colorado over the waters which might be impounded in a certain reservoir site.

There have been a number of decisions of the General Land Office and regulations issued by the same authority recognizing the doctrine of State control. In the circular of February 20, 1894, on page 169 the following language is used:

> The control of the flow and use of the water is therefore a matter under State or Territorial control.

And in the decision in the case of H. H. Sinclair et al. (18 L. D., 573) it is said:

> The act of March 3, 1891, deals only with the right of way over the public land to be used for the purposes of irrigation, leaving the disposition of the water to the State.

The General Land Office in operating under the desert-land law, recognizes only water rights certified by State authorities.

The Supreme Court has also in several decisions recognized the right of the State to regulate and control the use of water within its borders. And turning to political and administrative declarations we find that the Republican party in its platform of 1900 in its irrigation declaration used the following language:

> Reserving control of the distribution of water for irrigation to the respective States and Territories.

President Roosevelt in his message said:

> The distribution of the water, the division of the streams among irrigators, should be left to the settlers themselves in conformity with State laws and without interference with these laws or with vested rights.

Now, I hope I have answered the gentleman, and I trust he will not interrupt me further, much as I would be pleased to answer him, for my time is limited.

The provisions of the bill in this regard may be considered ideal, and at the same time extremely practical. The settler is provided with the best form of water right, and the protection of this right and the proper distribution among users under these rights becomes at once a matter of local concern, and the expenditures relative thereto are borne locally.

The provisions of section 9 relative to the distribution of the fund are believed to be wise and equitable. The fund may be used at any point in the arid region, but ultimately each State and Territory which has feasible and practicable projects is to receive the benefit of at least half of the proceeds of the sales of public lands with such State.

It will be seen from this brief statement of the form and character of the proposed legislation that it is simple in its operation; that it is calculated to provide homes on the public domain in small tracts for actual settlers; that it invites no conflict between Federal and State authorities; that it will reduce the size of private holdings in the arid region, and that it will tend to a harmonious development of all parts thereof.

AS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The measure has been attacked on constitutional grounds. I am not a lawyer; therefore can not claim to be an expounder of the Constitution of the United States. As a layman I venture to express the hope that our Constitution, which, it is held, empowers us to spend hundreds of millions in distant parts of the earth for the benefit of other peoples, does not impose barriers to the development of our own country. I am one of those who believe the Constitution grants us the power as a people to do our duty abroad, though it cost precious blood and countless treasure. I hope that great instrument does not interpose obstacles to a peaceful conquest of the rebellious forces of nature in our own country, particularly when it can be accomplished without cost to our people. This is not a proposition to use the public revenues for the work of developing the arid region. If it were, and in the form of a loan, reimbursable as under the provisions of the bill, I can not understand how it would be any more subject to the objection of being unconstitutional than was Government aid in the building of the transcontinental railways; but there is no necessity of discussing that point, for this is a proposition only to use the proceeds of the sales of certain public lands for the purpose of making other lands salable.

Under the Constitution the Congress has the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the public lands. It can give away all the public lands or any portion of them or sell and dispose of them in any way it sees fit, and certainly this power includes the power to dispose of the public lands in the manner we propose. Under this legislation we constitute a trust fund of the sales of public lands to be used for the purpose of making other lands habitable, and the authority of Congress to use the proceeds of the sales of public lands for so laudable a purpose has never been, so far as I know, denied or disputed, except by the gentlemen who filed a minority report in opposition to this measure.

THE VIEW CONGRESS HAS TAKEN.

A review of Congressional action in the disposition of the public lands and their proceeds for the past forty years clearly demonstrates two facts: First, that the power of Congress over the disposition of the public lands is plenary; second, that the public lands and the proceeds thereof have been considered, not as a source of public revenue, but as a trust to be used for the settlement and development of the country and for the benefit of the people.

In the past forty years among other dispositions of the public lands have been the following:

		Acres.
Disposed of under the homestead act (approximated)		128,157,074
Grants in aid of railroads and wagon roads:
Patented up to June 30, 1901	95,399,652
Estimated grants not patented	45,000,000
		140,399,652
Grants to States for canal purposes		4,433,073
Grants to States for river improvement		1,406,210
Approved to States as swamp lands June 30, 1901		64,498,757
Grants to States for educational, charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions, for public buildings, public improvements, reclamation, and other purposes		109,100,238
Total		447,995,004
In addition to the above there are swamp-land claims unadjudicated, estimated at about		6,500,000
Total		454,495,004

Congress has not been less liberal in the disposition of the proceeds of the sales of public lands than in the disposal of the lands themselves, and in its action in regard thereto has evidently been guided by the same policy—namely, to treat these sums as funds held in trust for the people, and has made the following disposition of them:

For support of colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts	$11,602,000.00
Agricultural experiment stations	9,968,734.05
Common schools, internal improvements, and other purposes, 5 per cent on sales	12,100,296.56
Swamp land, cash indemnity	2,036,733.58
Total	35,707,764.59

If Congress has the right, which has never been denied, to give away public lands, with or without stipulation as to their use and final disposition, and to appropriate the proceeds for a wide range of purposes for which it is somewhat doubtful if the funds derived from taxation of the people could be used, it is clear that Congress has the authority, as we propose, to provide for the creation of a trust fund from the proceeds of the sales of public lands and to direct the use of this fund for the purpose of making other public lands salable and useful with a view of transforming deserts into habitable regions and making possible the great increase in the general wealth, power, and prosperity of the country which must follow such development.

The minority report pays a great deal of attention to section 7 of the proposed legislation. In fact, about half of that elaborate report is devoted to a labored effort to prove that the Federal Government has no authority to condemn lands and water rights for the purposes of this act. The gentleman who wrote that report might have saved himself a great deal of trouble. Personally I agree with his contention on that point, but the bill does not contemplate the undertaking which he so elaborately argues is unconstitutional, and if it did contemplate it the question of whether or not it could be done is of relative unimportance.

In some of the arid States land and water rights can be condemned for the purposes contemplated in this bill, and in such States the Secretary of the Interior would have as much authority to condemn as any other individual, and no more. Where the State laws do not recognize the right to condemn property for the purposes contemplated in the act, it will not be condemned, and there is the end of it; but the power to condemn water rights and lands is by no means necessary for the carrying out of this act, and where the power is possessed it would in all probability be very seldom exercised; and where the State laws do not authorize condemnation, and projects can not be carried on without condemnation, those particular projects will not be undertaken, and others, where there is no such obstacle, will.

UNFOUNDED FEAR OF AGRICULTURAL COMPETITION.

One of the alleged arguments used against this measure is that it would be unfair to the farmers of the country because it would increase the acreage of our cultivated lands and the aggregate of agricultural produce, and thus tend to keep down farm values and the prices of farm products. The very statement of this ground of opposition is sufficient to indicate its selfish, narrow, provincial, and unstatesmanlike character. If arguments of this sort had been made by the people of the East against the enactment of the homestead law they might have had some force and justification, for that law opened in competition with the comparatively unfertile lands of the seaboard and the Alleghenies the marvelously rich and fertile lands of the Mississippi Valley, which required only the turning of the sod to produce bountiful crops, and which were granted to the settlers without any payment whatever.

A speech made on the floor of the House early in the session on this subject sounded like a belated protest against the adoption of the homestead policy of forty years ago rather than as an argument applicable to the legislation now proposed, for it came from a gentleman who represents a district which at the time of the passage of the homestead law was almost exclusively agricultural and whose farmers did undoubtedly feel keenly the effects of the passage of the act which opened to free settlement the lands of the Mississippi Valley, but his arguments could scarcely apply to legislation which proposes the gradual development of the irrigation possibilities of a region from a thousand to two thousand miles removed, whose products could by no possibility compete with the products of the farms of his district, but the opening of which would afford opportunity for the farmers' sons of his region to secure a home in the West, not free, as under the homestead law in the Mississippi Valley, it is true, but by the payment through a series of years of the expenditures made by the Government, and thus aid in the development of a great region which will furnish splendid markets for the manufactured products of the region which he represents.

Some opposition has also been voiced to this measure by a gentleman representing a fair and fertile district in the Mississippi Valley, where most of the lands now occupied by his constituents were given them by the Government under the provisions of the homestead law. It seems scarcely fair that a gentleman from that great valley, whose wonderful agricultural development was made possible by the bounty of nature and the beneficence of the Government, whose constituents are now obtaining the best average prices for their products they have ever received, should oppose a measure which, instead of giving fertile and humid lands free to the settler, simply seeks to make it possible for courageous and industrious people to redeem lands now barren, by the laborious processes of irrigation, and the repayment to the Government of its expenditures in bringing water within their reach.

As a matter of fact, the fears of competition of irrigated lands with the farms of the humid portion of our country are entirely without foundation. We have reached the end of rapid increases in cultivated acreage of our farm lands in the humid belt. The average annual increases of 5,000,000 acres of a few years ago has already diminished considerably, while our increases in population grows larger year by year. At present it is about 1,500,000 per annum.

Reclamation by irrigation is a slow process at best, and the increase in acreage is gradual. With all the cheapest and most feasible projects to work upon in forty years, we have irrigated fewer acres than the farmers of the humid region have brought under the plow in several single seasons in the past twenty years.

Assuming that the expenditure by the Government on the projects undertaken under the bill shall average $10 per acre and the fund would only furnish water for from 250,000 to 300,000 acres annually, and this total would only be reached five or six years after the work was inaugurated, should the Government expenditure average less per acre by half the maximum increase would ultimately be half a million acres or one-tenth of our average increase in acreage for the past thirty years.

Even if it were possible to rapidly increase, under the provisions of this bill or by other means, the irrigated area of the country the products of such lands would not and could not successfully compete with the products of the fertile lands of the humid regions. In the first place, the great staples of the country can not generally be so successfully or so cheaply produced under irrigation as by natural rainfall. Little corn is or ever will be grown on the irrigated lands of the West. The production of cotton has never been undertaken and probably never will be to any extent on irrigated lands in the United States. The production of cereals so far in the irrigated portions of the West has not kept pace with the local demand.

If by any possibility there should be any surplus of wheat in this region, it would find its market in the Orient rather than in competition with the wheat of the humid region. The products of the northern half of the arid region will undoubtedly continue to be, as now, very largely alfalfa and other grasses necessary to supplement the pasturage of the surrounding grazing regions in the growth and preparation of live stock for fattening in the corn belt of the Mississippi Valley and crops and products not grown elsewhere or necessary for the partial supply of a local demand. In the southern portion of the region will be grown tropical and semitropical fruits and products to take the place of products of the same character which are now largely imported.

AS TO THE FEAR OF VAST OUTLAY.

The opponents of this measure have claimed that it would lead to a vast expenditure by the General Government, and the most exaggerated statements have been made as to probable aggregate outlay. It should be borne in mind that it is not proposed to take a penny for the work contemplated out of the public Treasury. Provision is made whereby the arid region shall reclaim itself by utilizing the sale of public lands there for that purpose. By no possibility can the expenditures under the bill exceed the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the region affected by it, and this is not a direct expenditure, but is rather in the nature of a loan, inasmuch as the settler is to pay to the Government the cost of the reclamation of his land, and in this way the money paid out for the construction of the works is returned to the Treasury. It is true that if the bill becomes a law and works satisfactorily, in the course of time a large sum of money will be spent by the Government in the construction of irrigation works, but under the provisions of the bill these sums are to be repaid, so that the reclamation fund, instead of decreasing, will constantly increase. The only actual expenditure under the bill not reimbursable would be certain items of administration, surveys, and examinations of projects the construction of which for one reason or another might not be undertaken.

It is true that the argument is made that while the bill provides for the repayment to the Government of the cost of construction of irrigation works, if the bill were passed members of Congress from the districts and States interested would soon be clamoring for the relief of their constituents from these payments. This argument is founded on a misunderstanding of the conditions in the arid region. It should be remembered that the lands which will be irrigated under Government works will be in the vicinity of large areas of land irrigated by private, cooperative, and corporate enterprise. Those interested in and dwelling upon the lands so irrigated would earnestly protest against the settlers in their own regions and vicinity living under the Government works being relieved from their payments, as that would have a tendency to lower the value of all irrigated lands in the region and work a hardship on them. Further than that, those in one part of the arid region who were waiting for the development of irrigation in their vicinity and who could only hope for such development by the replenishment of the fund, would object seriously to any legislation which would relieve anyone from payments under the bill and thereby delay the inauguration of works in their vicinity.

Let us admit for the sake of argument that no repayments will ever be made by any settler under the works contemplated by this act. In that event, as the expenditures are limited to the sums received from the sales of public lands, there would be no expenditure of moneys raised by taxation. I have called attention to the fact that in forty years we had disposed of, under the homestead law as grants to railways and States, over 450,000,000 acres of land and over $35,000,000 of the proceeds of the sales of land, and these lands were, many of them, rich and valuable; most of them would produce a crop without irrigation; so that if we disposed of the proceeds of the 535,000,000 acres of lands in the States named in this bill for the development of the region we would only be following our policy since 1860.

Private enterprise, stimulated by the work performed by the Government and encouraged to undertakings now impracticable by growth in population and extension of lines of communication, will undoubtedly carry on irrigation development and reclamation in the aggregate more rapidly than will be accomplished by the works constructed under the provisions of this bill.

BENEFITS TO THE SEMIARID AND ADJACENT REGIONS.

The bill provides for the sinking of artesian wells, with a special view to the development of irrigation possibilities by this method in the semiarid region. It is hoped that test wells will demonstrate the existence of extensive artesian basins throughout western Kansas and Nebraska as well as elsewhere in the region. The semiarid States which receive their waters from the arid mountain States will not only have the benefit of all the storage and diversion undertaken with a view of reclaiming lands within their borders, but will also be benefited by every storage and diversion work undertaken and accomplished at the headwaters and along the upper courses of the streams. The storage works will hold back flood waters which would otherwise go to waste or cause destruction, and these waters utilized in connection with the natural flow of the stream for the irrigation of large tracts of land would in a short time convert those tracts, now absolutely dry, into water-soaked areas, the seepage from which returning to the streams would produce a largely increased and uniform flow in the lower courses of the rivers at a time when under present conditions the streams are lowest.

The great value of storage and irrigation at the headwaters of streams has been abundantly demonstrated both in the United States and abroad, and we may confidently expect that the time will come when storage near the headwaters and its use in irrigation along the courses of many of the large streams in the arid and simiarid regions which are now generally dry, or nearly so, in the late summer will entirely change their character and cause them to become perennial streams of uniform flow.

The proposed legislation is of vast importance and will be far-reaching in its effect, for it outlines a plan and inaugurates a policy which it is believed will lead to the reclamation of the arid and the semiarid lands of the West, so far as that reclamation is possible with the available water supply. The total area which may be ultimately reclaimed it is impossible at this time to intelligently estimate, for it will depend largely upon what proportion of the water supply of the region can be conserved and applied to the soil with an outlay per acre which will be warranted by the productive capacity of the land irrigated, and the estimates of the acreage which can be irrigated, varying as they do from 40,000,000 to 75,000,000 of acres, measure the different views as to the expenditure per acre which may be ultimately justified by the demand for, or the value of, irrigated lands.

The reclamation from the desert of these vast acreages which will necessitate the conservation within the arid regions of a large portion of the waters that now run to waste in flood times and winter flows will not only make possible a largely increased population and the addition of vast wealth to our country, but will have a marked effect upon the climate and climatic conditions of all the western portion of the valley of the Mississippi by reason of the tremendously increased evaporation from the irrigated areas and, in my opinion, it is no exaggeration to say that the benefits to the irrigated country will not be greater than those conferred upon the adjacent territory, as the effect of that irrigation in increasing the humidity of the entire region, in cooling the lair of the siroccos that now blow from the arid plains, and thus preventing the present oft-recurring and disastrous droughts.

THE DUTY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

I am of the opinion that an imperative duty devolves upon the American Congress to lend assistance to the development of the great arid and semiarid portion of our country now but sparsely settled, but capable when fully developed of maintaining a large and prosperous population. In this territory must be found homes for the sons of the farmers of the Eastern and Middle States who may desire to take Horace Greeley's advice to "go West and grow up with the country." In this region lies the best and most hopeful field for an increased market for American manufacturers, not only among those who shall occupy the irrigated farms, but also among the great mining and urban populations which will be established there.

To aid in the reclamation of the desert and in establishing there a home-owning population who will vastly increase the strength and prosperity of the entire nation is not only a most inspiring undertaking, but is a duty which the Government can not escape, which is paramount in importance to every other duty now laid upon the American people. It is a duty which every government since the dawn of recorded history occupying an arid region has recognized and fulfilled. Surely this great and enlightened Government will not be less faithful in assuming its responsibilities in this regard than were ancient Egypt and Assyria, and in the latter days have been the Governments of India, Spain, and Italy.

It should be borne in mind that irrigation is not an experiment; that it was practiced before the dawn of recorded history; that under its practice man first attained a high degree of civilization; that through its efficiency the great nations of antiquity established and maintained their might and glory. Neither is irrigation a new question in the United States. With the exception of India alone, we have a larger irrigated area than any country on the globe. We have met successfully practically every question, legal, financial, and engineering, which irrigation can present; so that there is nothing in the nature of an experiment in the work which it is proposed that the Government shall undertake.

The plan presented for the prosecution of the work proposed is a simple one. It imposes no dollar of taxation upon any American citizen, recognizes the dual character of our Government, and, inviting no conflict of authority, provides a business-like method for the accomplishment of great undertakings and maintains the American principle of small farms under water rights ample and secure. No nation confronted with an imperative duty of far-reaching importance, the fulfillment of which promised to add so much to its strength and dignity, has had presented to it a solution so simple, with such promise of successful outcome.

If he is a public benefactor who makes two blades of grass grow where only one grew before, how fully assured may we be of the gratitude of our countrymen in lending our influence to this legislation which shall make possible the transformation of vast areas now dreary and verdureless into fertile fields yielding the cheering vine and the sustaining grain, which will substitute for the weird cry of the coyote over the lonely wastes the hum of peaceful industry and the sweet tones of village bells.

Plato tells us of the lost Atlantis sunk beneath the heaving bosom of the briny deep, of her stately cities and the perennial verdure of her irrigated fields and vineyards. We have held old Plato a dreamer, but we shall hail him as a prophet, for we shall make his legend a reality; we shall raise the fair and verdant Atlantis not from the oceans, but from the desert's wastes; we shall there renew her irrigating canals, restore her fields and gardens, rebuild her cities, and reflect the fairest legend of the classic past in the splendid reality of a happy future. [Applause.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am exceedingly sorry to be compelled, from a sense of public duty, to oppose the gentleman's bill, intended, as he intimates in closing, to destroy the coyote on the desert plains of the great West. I think the gentleman has described its purpose very accurately, although he did refer to Plato and said something about restoring gardens and fruitful fields in Egypt and Asia and all that sort of thing. That is all very beautiful and would be all right in the West if the people who are to enjoy the benefits of the scheme of the gentleman were to pay the expense and it were within the legitimate scope of our powers to enact this legislation.

This is a great country indeed. We have nearly eighty millions of people. We have millions of square miles of territory. We have rocky lands, swamp lands, hill lands, and mountain lands. But, in my judgment, the time has not come when the taxpayers and farmers of the East can properly or legitimately be called upon to contribute to the development of farms and farm lands in the great West. The time has not come when they are called upon to consent to the taking by the Government of money that belongs to all the people for the improvement of lands in the States and Territories of the great West. The benefits of such a scheme will inure solely to the people of those States and of those Territories. We all concede, we must concede, that there are millions of acres of arid and semiarid lands in the great West, and perhaps millions of these acres—certainly thousands of these acres—may by irrigation be made productive. No one disputes that.

But the question is when and how shall this be done; at whose expense shall it be done? The scheme is that we take the money derived from the sales of public lands, place them in a fund to be known as an irrigation or reclamation fund, then to enter upon the construction of vast reservoirs for the storage, they say, of surplus waters—that is, in the rainy season they propose to keep back all the surplus waters, then build canals that will carry those waters to various parts of the lands to be irrigated and use them in the dry season for the irrigation of those now desert lands.

Considerable has been said by the gentleman who has preceded me, an advocate of this bill, to the effect that if the scheme is adopted it will give free homes to settlers upon these lands in future years. Free homes! and he claims that it is in accord with the idea of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] to provide "free homes." Why, Mr. Chairman, what is this scheme? I have in my hand, and under the liberty to print already given I shall print in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, the history of one of these pet schemes, the pet scheme of the Interior Department, the first one of them to be inaugurated, if I understand the matter correctly, and under it the cost of an acre of land to the settler is to be $21 per acre. In other words, he is to go into Wyoming, I think it is—perhaps I have mistaken the State, but it is in that vicinity. I refer to the Milk River irrigation scheme.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RAY of New York. I will surrender my time for a question only.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to ask you whether you do not recognize that under this bill the settler gets the land free, because he has got the right to exercise his homestead right, but he pays for the water right?

Mr. RAY of New York. An acre of arid land that a coyote can not live on is not a free home to any human being, and when you undertake on the floor of this House to say that you are conferring a benefit on an American citizen by allowing him to exercise his right to take 160 acres of desert land as a free home you are stating a ridiculous proposition.

Mr. SHAFROTH. You admit that he need not take it unless he wants it?

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And if he does, he does it for his own advantage?

Mr. RAY of New York. I admit that, and everybody knows it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. RAY of New York. No; I can not. I understand your scheme. I have been on the committee for three years. I have heard this wild, improvident scheme discussed in all its aspects—from all its different standpoints. What I am resenting now is the attempt by the promoters of this scheme to get this House to understand and get the country to understand that this bill will give free homes to the surplus population of the United States who are looking for free homes, and to whom, if possible, we ought to give free homes.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman now yield to me?

Mr. RAY of New York. No; I will not. I did not interrupt the gentleman. Do not take my time. Here is your scheme, and here is your proposition: We are to take the proceeds of the public lands in the first instance, and we have about $6,000,000 on hand, and we are to build reservoirs and dig canals out in the great West to carry the waters from the reservoirs to the arid lands, in some places hundreds of miles distant; in some places over the mountains; in some places you are going to take the water into Canada and then bring it in a roundabout course back into the United States to irrigate land in the United States. This is your scheme, and you can not deny it. The settler may then go, if he sees fit, to this arid land and take up 160 acres of desert or arid lands as a home, and by paying the cost of irrigation have irrigated land. Such a scheme, I pause to say, will lead to international complications and contentions the consequences of which no man can foretell.

The settler is to pay the Government a price for the water rights with which to irrigate his arid land, and the Secretary of the Interior fixes that price or cost. It is left optional with the Secretary of the Interior. He is to fix the amount that the settler is to pay. On the Milk River claim he is to pay, it is supposed, $21 an acre——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RAY of New York. I can not.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not want to make a misstatement?

Mr. RAY of New York. I can not yield, and I do not yield. I trust my friend will understand.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not think my friend wanted a misstatement to go into the RECORD.

Mr. RAY of New York. No misstatement will get into the RECORD. I love the gentleman from Wyoming, would yield if I could, but "time is fleeting"——

Mr. MONDELL. And the gentleman from Wyoming returns his affection. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY of New York (continuing). And his efforts to get a benefit for his people out of the public Treasury ought to meet with the same approval over the country at large and from the membership of this House that all schemes of that kind meet, and no greater.

Now, what I intended to say is that under the provisions of this bill certain States and two Territories would get large benefits. No doubt about that. That I concede, but it will be at the expense of the people of other States of this Union. It will be at the expense of the taxpayers of the rest of this country.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I thought the gentleman said the settler had to pay it.

Mr. RAY of New York. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Did not the gentleman say that the settler had to pay this?

Mr. RAY of New York. I did not. Can not the gentleman understand what I said? [Laughter.]

Mr. SHAFROTH. I can not comprehend how you can charge that these people will get the benefit of it and yet at the same time they have to pay for it. I can't understand that.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. I will not yield. Now let me repeat once more. You may go and take a piece of desert land free. When you have taken your land, if you desire to have irrigation, to have water, then you are to pay over to the Government such a sum of money as the Secretary of the Interior fixes as a proper compensation for the water right.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It says his "proportion of the total cost of construction;" that is the language of the bill.

Mr. RAY of New York. He pays for this in the beginning. The public lands belong to all the people of the United States, the people in all the States, and you propose to take this money, in the first instance, that belongs to all the people, for the construction of these dams and these reservoirs in order that you may build up and render irrigable and productive these lands in certain States and Territories. Now, whatever comes back from the men who take up these lands is not, under this bill, to come back into the public Treasury and to be used for the benefit of all the people, but that money is to be used in the repair of existing and in the construction and extension of other irrigation works; and it is conceded, I may say, in the Committee on Irrigation, and conceded everywhere, that the public Treasury never will get back the cost of construction.

It is conceded that the money never can come back, because the cost of maintenance or the cost of the extension and repairs will use all. Except, some gentlemen claim, that way in the far-distant future, when the present generation and its descendants, their great-grandchilden, and their great-great-great-grandchildren are all gone, there is a possibility that from the revenues of these water rights, revenues derived from the reservoirs, there may be a surplus that will go back into the public Treasury. But that is so far in the future, such a dim vision, that no one pretends to specify the time within a thousand years when a benefit could accrue to the people of the United States.

Now, there is your scheme in the beginning. My first objection to it is that it is unfair; that it is taking the money of all the people to build up one section of this great country, and that it is wrong in principle, sectional, and unwise.

Mr. MONDELL. Just one question.

Mr. RAY of New York. I can not yield, and please do not use my time in this way. Now, another objection is that it puts too much power, it puts a dangerous power, into the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. He is to make the rules and regulations; he is to control this fund. True, he is to report to Congress what he has done and what he is doing, but what will Congress do? What will Congress know about it? It makes him the arbiter of this whole question substantially unrestrained. Of course Congress could step in at any time and interfere and repeal the law and put the power elsewhere. All that I concede. But I do claim that no such power as this ought to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. He will have no time to attend to it. The Secretary could not give attention to all the details, and the result will be that in that Department the management of these irrigation works, their construction, the letting of these contracts—and there is no certain limitation upon the power to make these contracts—will pass into the hands of subordinates in the Interior Department, and I believe that it will lead to possible corruption and to scandals. Here is the Milk River project I have referred to:

THE ST. MARY DIVERSION CANAL.

The Secretary of the Interior recommended for construction the St. Mary Diversion Canal in northern Montana. A Senate committee report gives some particulars of the work in contemplation and is singularly silent on others of first importance.

It is proposed to divert water from the St. Mary River by a canal 44 miles long to the South Fork of Milk River. Part of the water can be carried from the point in the natural channel of Milk River out of the United States, through Canada, and, after many miles, back into the United States again, for the irrigation of the lower Milk River Valley.

The other part would be carried through an extension of the canal 46 miles farther to Cutbank Creek, thence through the natural channel of that creek to the Marias River, whence it would be rediverted, together with Marias River water, through another canal 75 miles long.

The total irrigated area is estimated at 522,000 acres, 402,000 dependent on the Marias River and 120,000 on the St. Mary River. The cost of construction of the St. Mary diversion to Cutbank Creek is estimated at $1,623,000; the works on the lower Milk River basin, which can only be available for St. Mary water, at $900,000, a total of $2,523,000, or $21 per acre irrigated, which is more than twice the average cost of irrigation works in the United States. On the other hand, the Marias works are estimated at $977,000, which, for 402,000 acres, would give a rate of $2.43 per acre.

The St. Mary diversion canal involves some stupendous work, and on the showing made may well be considered impracticable from both commercial and an engineering standpoint.

The water of the St. Mary River can not be used in its own drainage in the United States. The Canadians have already developed irrigation works on the stream, and the United States now proposes to divert the water to the injury of the Canadian irrigator. The Senate committee report makes no mention of this international tangle, but seems to gloat over the fact that the Canadians can not redivert the water as it is transported through the Milk River in their territory.

The diversion of water from the St. Mary River is the smallest, the most expensive, and the only complicated part of the enterprise recommended by the Secretary, yet it is marked out as the point of first attack. We wonder why?

STORAGE AND DIVERSION OF THE WATERS OF ST. MARY LAKES, MONTANA.

The St. Mary project is designed to store flood waters in the St. Mary Lakes in Northern Montana and conduct these easterly by a canal cut through the ridges at the head of Milk River. These lakes receive the drainage from the high peaks of the Rocky Mountains, but, instead of continuing easterly across the plains, as do the rivers further south, the waters overflow northerly by St. Mary River to the Saskatchewan River and are lost in Hudsons Bay. The easterly course, which appears to be the original or natural direction for the waters to pursue, has been blocked by the glacial debris left near the foot of the mountains. In this low, irregular country are a number of small streams, most of which are tributary to Milk River. The proposed canal will restore what may be called the original preglacial drainage and allow the waters from the Rocky Mountains to continue eastward down the slope of the country.

Milk River, heading in the low, rolling country east of the foot of the mountains, has a general northeasterly direction, the two principal branches, North Fork and South Fork, uniting after crossing the Canadian line. The stream thus formed flows easterly for 150 miles or more, where it bends to the southward and again returns to Montana, finally emptying into the Missouri River. The broad Milk River Valley in Montana consists of a generally rolling country, adapted to irrigation. The water supply from the river is, however, deficient, owing to the lack of high mountain area at the head waters. The diversion canal, as planned, will restore the mountain catchment area to this stream.

It is proposed to build a low storage dam at a point about three-fourths of a mile below the present outlet of lower St. Mary Lake. This dam will have a maximum elevation of 50 feet above the bottom of the river and will form a reservoir of a capacity of 250,000 acre-feet. This reservoir will serve to hold the flood waters and the supply received from the melting snow in the mountains. The head of the diversion canal will be on the right hand or eastern side of the dam. It will continue down along the right bank of the river for about 7 miles, then turn easterly through a low gap.

The water of the St. Mary River is not used in the United States, but in Canadian territory, 7 miles north of the international line, is a canal completed in 1900. Between the site of the proposed dam at the foot of St. Mary Lake and the head of the Canadian canal a considerable number of large streams discharge into St. Mary River, furnishing an ample supply for the land irrigated in Canada. It is not believed that any international complication can arise concerning water rights, since the water which it is proposed to store and divert occurs wholly within Montana, and it would be impossible for the Canadians to store and utilize this flood water, even if needed in their canal.

The length of the proposed St. Mary Canal, from its head on St. Mary River to the North Fork of Milk River, is 27.4 miles, and the cost of construction, including dam and head gates and the drop at the North Fork, will be $687,000.

ESTIMATED COST OF ST. MARY DAM AND CANAL TO NORTH FORK OF MILK RIVER.

Dam	$22,000
Tunnel at head	12,000
Head gates	10,000
Head to Spider Lake excavation	245,100
Spider Lake to drop, North Fork excavation	288,400
Drop, North Fork	16,040
Two sets of waste gates on line	4,000
	597,540
Engineering and contingencies	89,460
Total	687,000

The canal has been planned to carry 1,200 cubic feet per second, and the amount of acreage to be reclaimed is estimated at 120,000 acres of public land, which would have a probable value of $35 per acre, or $4,200,000, and would sustain a population of 20,000. By storage in the lower Milk River Valley the area of reclaimed land, including the use of Milk River, can be increased to 300,000 acres.

The extension of the canal from North Fork to South Fork and turning it into this latter stream will have certain advantages over the plan for stopping the canal at the North Fork. The total cost of the canal, from the head to the South Fork of Milk River, will be $1,173,000, and its length will be 43.8 miles.

ESTIMATED COST OF ST. MARY DAM AND CANAL TO SOUTH FORK OF MILK RIVER.

Dam	$22,000
Tunnel	12,000
Head gates	10,000
Head to Spider Lake	245,100
Spider Lake to North Fork of Milk River	288,400
Two sets of waste gates	4,000
Siphon, North Fork	67,000
North Fork to South Fork Milk River	360,800
	1,009,300
Contingencies	109,000
Engineering	54,700
Total	1,173,000

If the water is turned into either the North or the South Fork of Milk River, it first finds its way into Canada before it can be used in the lower basin. The valley proper of Milk River in Canada is comparatively narrow and has little irrigable land, so that any proposition on a large scale must contemplate using the high bench of lands above.

Milk River in Canada, from the junction of the North and South Forks downstream, has a very slight fall—not more than 2 feet to the mile—and a canal of 100 miles or more in length would be necessary before the water could be brought to the upper benches. It is not, therefore, considered feasible to divert the waters from Milk River in Canada. In case this should ever be attempted it is entirely practicable to keep the water in American territory by an extension of the canal from the South Fork to the Marias River. The canal from the South Fork could be carried around the ridge between the basin of this stream and that of the Marias drainage, and after running for a distance of about 46 miles from South Fork it could be turned into Cutbank Creek. The cost of construction from the head to this point will approximate $1,623,000, and the distance will be 90 miles. The canal has not yet been located from the South Fork to Cutbank Creek, and the latter figure of cost is a rough estimate.

The water could then be allowed to continue down the natural channel of this stream and the Marias for 100 miles or more, when it would be diverted from the latter near the mouth of Willow Creek, and in the course of about 75 miles turned into Big Sandy Creek, a tributary of Lower Milk River. This plan keeps the canal in the United States territory for its entire course until it reaches Lower Milk River, where the water can be most advantageously used. The total cost, from the head on St. Mary River to Big Sandy Creek, by the Marias diversion, is placed at $2,600,000. This location has not been surveyed, however, and the above estimate, together with those that follow, are simply roughly approximate.

Plans have also been considered for a secondary system of storage reservoirs in the Lower Milk River basin.

If this plan is adopted of turning the water of St. Mary Lake into the South Fork of Milk River, allowiug it to continue down through Canada, and then utilizing it through the secondary storage system in Lower Milk River Valley 300,000 acres can be reclaimed at an estimated cost of from $7 to $9 per acre.

In the complete development of the system, including the utilization of St. Marys and Marias waters and the construction of the secondary storage systems, about 500,000 acres can be reclaimed at a cost not to exceed $10 per acre.

Three public documents have been issued, in which reference has been made to the St. Marys canal project in Montana. They are—

(a) Hearings before the Committee on the Public Lands, House of Representatives, January 11-30, 1901.

(b) Report No. 254 of the Senate Committee on the Reclamation of Arid Lands, 1902.

(c) A condensed statement taken from the report on the St. Marys canal project.

The last has recently been given publicity, and is, in many respects, a remarkable document. Its opening paragraph indicates that it is the intention not only to "commit the Government," as Mr. Maxwell puts it, to the construction of an irrigation canal in Montana, but to complete the work of nature in accordance with the ideas of the Geological Survey—"To restore what may be called the original pre-Glacial drainage and allow the waters from the Rocky Mountains to continue eastward down the slope of the country."

There is no occasion to be surprised at the bold proposition; the only wonder is that, having found fault with nature for disturbing the course of the waters of the St. Marys River, it is not also proposed to twist the Rocky Mountains a little farther round so that the waters of the Belly River and other minor streams that rise in the United States and flow north into Canada may also enjoy the privilege of continuing easterly across the plains as do the rivers farther south—south of that imaginary line termed the "international boundary."

The third paragraph gives some details of the work of storage proposed, as distinct from that of diversion, following upon the opening words: "The St. Mary project is designed to store flood waters in the St. Mary lakes." This is evidently a new feature of the scheme, as in 1901 Mr. Maxwell stated before the Committee on the Public Lands (see p. 51): "In northern Montana the principal project is not a water-storage plant." The dam is stated to have a maximum elevation of 50 feet above the bed of the river. Farther on the cost of this structure is stated at $22,000, which strikes the ordinary mind as a remarkably low figure for any character of structure of the dimensions quoted in the locality in question.

The fourth paragraph contains the first public admission that the Canadians use the waters of the St. Mary River for irrigation purposes. Has there been any reason for this peculiar silence in the past? It is stated that "between the sites of the proposed dam at the foot of the St. Mary Lake and the head of the Canadian canal a considerable number of streams discharge into St. Mary River, furnishing an ample supply for the land irrigated in Canada." Is it likely that the United States is in possession of information as to the supply needed by Canada, the land now irrigated or that can be irrigated from the St. Mary River? Particular attention is called to the next sentence: "It is not believed that any international complication can arise concerning water rights, since the water which it is proposed to store and divert occurs wholly within Montana, and it would be impossible for the Canadians to store and utilize this flood water even if needed in their canal."

The waters of the Rio Grande River north of the Mexican boundary occur wholly within Colorado and New Mexico, yet so apprehensive is the United States of international complication arising with Mexico that injunctions have been maintained for some years against private corporations in New Mexico proposing to store and utilize the flood waters of the Rio Grande. The assertion that "it would be impossible for the Canadians to store and utilize the flood waters" is not supported by the submission of details, and it is probably as unfounded as the following statements regarding the character of Milk River in Canada: "Milk River in Canada, from the junction of the North and South Forks downstream, has a very slight fall, not more than 2 feet to the mile, and a canal of 100 miles or more in length would be necessary before the water could be brought to the upper benches." The fall of Milk River in Canada at the point referred to and for some distance downstream is at least three times that stated, and water can be applied to land for irrigation purposes within one-fifth of the distance stated, if not to "the upper benches," certainly to an area capable of absorbing all the water proposed to be diverted by this work.

The alternative proposition of carrying the water to the South Fork of the Milk River and thence to the Marias River, and thence through 100 miles of that stream, and thence by a canal 75 miles long to Big Sandy Creek, and thence, and so forth and so on, to the Milk River Valley, is, of course, still open. Leaving out of consideration the length of Big Sandy Creek through which it is proposed to carry the water to Milk River and the distance in Milk River itself before the lands to be irrigated are reached (neither of which lengths are stated), the water will have traveled 265 miles between the point of diversion and the point of initial application to irrigation uses.

There is no parallel to effective transportation of water for use in irrigation in any works over such a distance before use within the United States nor, one might boldly venture to assert, anywhere else. It is not to be suggested in that connection that simply because that has not been done before it can not be done at all, but it can be set up with assurance, supported by the results of the investigations of the United States Department of Agriculture and the experiment station of the Agricultural College of Colorado, to quote no other sources, that at the end of such mileage a net duty of 100 acres per cubic foot per second will not be obtained. That assertion will be so conclusive to even the merest tyro in irrigation as to need little evidential support. It will always be a marvel that such a contention could possibly be made.

By this route, the report goes on to say, "the total cost from the head on St. Mary River to Big Sandy Creek, by the Marias diversion, is placed at $2,600,000." That does not include the additional sum of $300,000 estimated for "the cost of secondary system of reservoir sites with their supply canals to the Lower Milk River basin?" This cost of $2,600,000 would be applied to the irrigation of 120,000 acres of land, a rate of $21.66 per acre. There are sundry references to the ultimate expansion to 200,000 acres at a "cost of from $7 to $9 per acre," and to 500,000 acres at a cost not to exceed $10 per acre. There is, however, absolutely no reference anywhere to the source of the additional water supply to care for the additional territory. The provision of 250,000 acre-feet at St. Marys Lake is one item only; there can be no more than the acreage due to 1,200 cubic feet irrigated until the connecting canal is enlarged to the capacity needed for the greater area.

Nowhere is provision made for the cost of such enlargement, and if it costs $2,600,000 for the construction to the initial capacity of 1,200 cubic feet per second, there would probably be a proportional cost to 3,000 cubic feet and 5,000 cubic feet. This rate of $21.66 must be considered a high one, even if the area reclaimed is to be estimated at the value of $35 per acre, which, it will be immediately apparent, no settler will be ready to pay to the United States Government for a homestead. The United States census of 1890 gives the average cost of irrigation at $8.15 per acre. On this point reference may again be made to the evidence of Mr. Newell, before the Committee on the Public Lands, House of Representatives, 1901, page 53. In answer to a question by Mr. SHAFROTH, as to the "estimate of cost of such work per acre of reclaimed land," Mr. Newell replied:

"The cost of providing the more accessible reclamation works would at first probably not exceed $5 per acre reclaimed."

It is quite evident, therefore, that the St. Marys project can not be regarded as one of the "more accessible reclamation works."

On page 51, Hearings before the Committee on the Public Lands, House of Representatives, Mr. Newell is quoted as saying:

"By a comparatively short canal, one which does not offer any great engineering difficulties, the headwaters can be taken out and turned into Milk River. * * * The estimates made thus far only include the first 9 miles of the canal. We have not yet been able to complete estimate for the remaining 7 miles."

The changes have been rung on the phrases, "no great engineering difficulties," "no considerable engineering obstacles," etc., while the facts would point to either a false suggestion or a modest effort to minimize the engineering ability that will overcome the obstacles in the event of the construction of this canal.

What are the facts?

Mr. Newell states the length of the canal, in the survey of 1900, as 16 miles from St. Mary Lakes to the North Fork of Milk River, the estimates for 9 miles of which only had been completed. The remaining 7 miles were "roughly approximated." In Report No. 254 of the Senate Committee on the Reclamation of Arid Lands that distance is stated at 27.4 miles. How is the difference accounted for? In the survey of 1900, is it not a fact that the 2 miles preceding the entrance to North Fork of Milk River developed a depth of cutting averaging 90 feet in depth, in itself a work of no inconsiderable engineering difficulty, which the survey of 1901 evidently proposes to avoid by a detour in location, increasing the length of canal from 16 to 27.4 miles, even then involving cutting over 30 feet in depth?

In the survey of 1900 it was proposed to bridge the North Fork of Milk River, in the event of adopting the all-American route, by a flume over 2,000 feet long and 150 feet maximum height, "no inconsiderable engineering difficulty." Not much publicity has been given to the fact; it is not even included in the "condensed statement taken from the report on the St. Mary Canal project," but the survey of 1901 proposes to avoid this flume by the construction of an inverted siphon 2,000 feet long, with an arch of 171 feet, to carry 1,200 cubic feet of water per second. "No inconsiderable engineering difficulty," yet the record of irrigation construction not only in the United States but in the world can be searched to find the parallel of such a structure. Not only will the engineer who designs a structure to successfully fulfill the conditions required be entitled to high rank among his fellows, but he who will complete it for the modest sum of $67,000 must be given preeminence among brilliant constructing engineers.

On the estimates submitted criticisms can not be offered, lacking details; the two items of $22,000 for a dam of 50 feet maximum height and $67,000 for an inverted siphon of 171 feet arch scarcely give evidence of reasonable approximation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RAY of New York. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I did not intend to disturb him so much. I did not intend to make him so uneasy. I am sorry for it. I apologize.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not uneasy; but I do not want the gentleman to go on making misstatements as to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. RAY of New York. I am stating the truth, substantially.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman said that the bill contained no limitation upon the power of the Secretary of the Interior to let contracts.

Mr. RAY of New York. I did not say that unqualifiedly.

Mr. MONDELL. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I understood him to say so.

Mr. RAY of New York. I said that in reality there were none. The bill purports to say that contracts shall be let when there is money in the Treasury in the reclamation fund for the purpose. But it does not expressly limit the power of the Secretary of the Interior in letting contracts to limit the cost to the amount of the money that is in the reclamation fund. It does not say that the amount of money required for the completion of these contracts shall not exceed the amount of money in the reclamation fund at the time the contract is made. And that brings me to my second objection, which is this: We give the Secretary of the Interior full authority to make these contracts; he may, under the provisions of the bill, make a contract the completion of which will cost a million dollars or five million dollars, when there are only $5,000 in the reclamation fund applicable to the particular work.

Mr. MONDELL. Now the gentleman does not want to have that statement go on record, I hope.

Mr. RAY of New York. That is exactly what this bill will permit.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I differ with the gentleman, but of course I do not want to take up his time.

Mr. RAY of New York. That is the plain construction. The careful lawyer in looking over the bill can come to no other conclusion.

Now, what will be the effect of that on the Public Treasury? Here is your Milk River scheme, which is going to cost us $21 an acre—$4,000,000 to $6,000,000 to provide the canals and the reservoir to irrigate those lands—there are $6,000,000 in the Treasury; it will take all that money to simply construct the reservoir and to construct those canals and ditches, and to take the water to those lands.

Other sections of the country will be clamoring for a reservoir and a canal; and the Secretary of the Interior, with $6,000,000 on hand, will start in to construct at least three or four different reservoirs, with canals, in different sections of the States named. If he does not do it—if he should not do it, provided this bill becomes a law—he will have such a clamor about his ears that he must resign. The Administration—I do not care whether Republican or Democratic—will have such a clamor from the West that it can not resist. Therefore, to please Nevada, the Secretary will start a reservoir on the eastern slope of California; to please Wyoming there would be established a reservoir somewhere up in the Rocky Mountains; to please Arizona there would be a reservoir established down in that section, and to please Colorado, a reservoir somewhere in that section.

It would not be a year before the Secretary of the Interior would be out of money, because there is only $6,000,000 in the Treasury; and how are you going to get more? Why, sir, this bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior is to withdraw from public sale and public entry all these lands that are irrigable. He may withdraw all the public lands if he sees fit. Therefore the sale of the land is to stop until irrigation reservoirs are completed, canals built, works put in, the land sold, and money begins to come back under the scheme. And that would necessarily be years hence. The result would be that under this bill within two years the Secretary would be without money. We would have reservoirs and canals, two or three or four, more or less, in process of construction in different points in these States. Being without money to complete them—without money to make them useful or protect them, without money to carry out the purposes of the bill—what follows?

Senators and Representatives interested in this scheme will come knocking at the doors of Congress, saying, "You have expended millions to inaugurate this scheme; you have undertaken this work; you have put thousands of dollars into these reservoirs—a million into that one, five hundred thousand into this one, and they are going to ruin, and the Government will lose all that it has invested unless you take hold of the matter now and out of the public Treasury appropriate money to completethis work."

That will be the cry; that will be the claim; and you know what the result will be. You inaugurate in this bill a scheme which within five years will bring Senators and Representatives of all these States named in this bill clamoring in the halls of Congress—lobbying about this Capitol—for an appropriation of money for the purpose of completing these works; and then we will say, "Why, to save this public property we must appropriate money out of the public Treasury."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the gentleman recognize the provision of the bill that the necessary funds for any given work must be available in the reclamation fund, and the Secretary of the Interior can not let any contract without that?

Mr. RAY of New York. Why, Mr. Chairman, if I had been undertaking to rob the Treasury deliberately, I would have drawn the bill in just this way. I would get the Congress committed to it under fair promises and with fair provisions in the bill. I would induce the Government to start a reservoir here, and another there, and another yonder, and would say that with the money derived from the sale of these public lands and deposited in the Treasury this work should go on and be completed. And when the Government is committed to it, then I repeat the cry will come, "There is no money in the Treasury from land sales to complete the work and we must change the law. The land has been withdrawn from sale; no land is being sold; you must not let this work which has been inaugurated, which is in process of construction, go to rack and ruin. In order to save it you must take money out of the public Treasury; you must tax the whole people to save the work that you have commenced."

Now, I have repeated the idea, and I trust gentlemen can comprehend it.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes.

Mr. REEDER. Does the gentleman mean to say that when we provide in this bill that no construction can be authorized unless the money is in the Treasury that that money will not be in the Treasury when the work is constructed?

Mr. RAY of New York. It does not say——

Mr. REEDER. It does exactly say so.

Mr. RAY of New York. The bill does not say that there must be money in this fund——

Mr. REEDER. You will find it on page 5.

Mr. RAY of New York. That there must be money in this fund sufficient to carry to completion, to put in operation, each one of the irrigation schemes commenced under it.

Mr. THAYER. Can you not leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. RAY of New York, That is the trouble with your bill. Certainly you can leave it to him, and when he has inaugurated these schemes and commenced the expenditure, and he has run out of money derived from public-land sales and the work is only one-quarter or one-half or two-thirds completed and useless, then you can come, as you will in my opinion, clamoring to Congress for an appropriation out of the Treasury to carry this scheme to completion. There is the trouble with the bill, with the whole scheme, there is the danger of it in the first instance. Now, another thing. Who will get the benefit? Does this bill confine the lands to be irrigated by these works to lands taken up by settlers, those who come hereafter upon the public lands in the great West for the purpose of making their homes upon what is now the public domain? Not at all.

The Secretary of the Interior is not restricted in disposing of water rights to selling them to settlers who come upon those lands. A man who purchases of one of these railroad companies—a man who owns land there now—may purchase of the Government a water right. True, the amount of the water right he may obtain is limited, but still he may get it; and so we find behind this scheme, egging it on, encouraging it, the great railroad interests of the West, who own millions of acres of these arid lands, now useless, and the very moment that we, at the public expense, establish or construct these irrigation works and reservoir, you will find multiplied by 10, and in some instances by 20, the value of now worthless land owned by those railroad companies, the title to which they obtained through grants from the Government for building great transcontinental railroad lines. Therefore I can not account for the favor this bill receives in some quarters. Again, it is unfair——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman allow me right there?

Mr. RAY of New York. I will not, with all due deference, and begging the gentleman's pardon, for I have not the time. It is unfair to the farmers of the East, unfair to the farmers of New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and other States I might name for the Congress of the United States to take their money, money which belongs to them in common with other citizens of other States, unjust to take that money for the construction of these reservoirs and the promotion of these schemes, which can only in their result build up the particular States and Territories where the works are located and where the canals run.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman from New York allow me right there?

Mr. RAY of New York. In a moment. [It will at the public expense build up competition in the great West with which the farmers in the East must contend, and no one will claim for a moment, because they can not justly make the contention, that there is to-day any deficiency of farming lands in the United States. We have broad acres enough; a chance to put to work all who will work.] If there is a surplus anywhere to-day of people who desire to go upon the farm let them come into New York and we can give them a fair chance to purchase a home, a fair chance to till the soil.

Mr. THAYER arose.

Mr. RAY of New York. No; I promised to yield to the gentleman from Illinois. Now, what is the question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I was going to suggest to the gentleman from New York that we have appropriated millions of dollars for the harbor of New York City. Now, that benefits the city of New York as against Boston, as against Charleston, S. C., and other points, and yet the gentleman has voted for that appropriation, has he not?

Mr. RAY of New York. Do you draw any sort of comparison between a scheme to promote interstate and foreign commerce especially, and a scheme to irrigate desert lands within a State of this Union?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The President says they are identical in principle.

Mr. RAY of New York. I have not asked you any sort of a question, my friend. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to say to the gentleman from New York that the same line of argument that is used——

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, I have asked you a question. Answer it. Do you say that there is a parallel——

Mr. HOPKINS. Oh, yes.

Mr. RAY of New York. You do?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; and I can show the gentleman——

Mr. RAY of New York. Then I will come to that.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will show the gentleman the parallel right now if he will allow me to make it.

Mr. RAY of New York. I was coming to it, and I will come to it right now. I trust that when my friend gets to be a Senator, as I hope he will, he will again study the Constitution of the United States. Evidently he has been so engaged with his political canvass that he has allowed some of the provisions of that instrument to pass out of his mind. I know that he has read it in the past and that he will read it again in the future. When he does so he will find what he has temporarily forgotten, that the Constitution of the United States gives to the Congress of the United States full and complete power over the subject of interstate and foreign commerce, and under that clause of the Constitution we have the right—we have always exercised it, we always will, and we always ought to exercise it—to promote commerce between the United States and foreign countries by improving and keeping open our rivers and harbors. But the irrigation of our public lands for sale to private owners neither promotes the general welfare of the United States nor protects nor promotes interstate or foreign commerce in the constitutional sense.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman——

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, why do you so constantly disturb me?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I just want to read the provision of the Constitution to which you refer, to show you that it does not bear the interpretation you put upon it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Do not show how disturbed you are. Please be quiet.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, I should like to have you yield when you are discussing the question.

Mr. RAY of New York. I must not give away all of my time. It is limited.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But here is the constitutional provision.

Mr. RAY of New York. Under the provision relating to interstate and foreign commerce we improve the harbor at Chicago, we improve the harbor at Duluth, we improve the harbor at Charleston, at Boston, Philadelphia, and hundreds of other points.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman, we are very much interested in this question, and we should like to hear what the gentleman is saying.

Mr. RAY of New York. I think if every gentleman will listen to what I am saying, there will be no difficulty in my being heard. And I wish to say to you that it will pay you to listen. I have studied this subject carefully, and I have some information to give you. It is correct information. I will cite you some authorities, and if you will study them you will see that you can not constitutionally support this measure, and that it can not be executed, if it is written upon the statute book, never.

Through the ports of New York, Boston, Charleston, Philadelphia, and New Orleans, maintained and kept open largely at the public expense, we take the pork from Illinois and the other States, we take the wheat and corn that grow upon the broad prairies of the great West and carry them out upon and over the ocean and to foreign markets. Were this not done you of the West could not reach the European markets. We do it under special authority of the Constitution. I will not enlarge upon that idea, but where do you find warrant in the Constitution of the United States——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman contend that the power to improve rivers and harbors is derived from the power in the Constitution to regulate interstate and foreign commerce?

Mr. RAY of New York. Why, of course you could exercise under the general-welfare clause if you desired or preferred to do so.

Mr. MANN. I always supposed it was under the general-welfare clause.

Mr. RAY of New York. There has been a great deal of contention among constitutional lawyers as to whether it comes under the general-welfare clause or under the other I have mentioned.

Mr. MANN. I wish simply to get the opinion of the gentleman, because he has studied the subject and is well informed.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, I will say, as the Supreme Court have said, and I can cite you to a dozen cases, that if it is not justified under the one clause of the Constitution—that is, the general-welfare clause—it is justified under the other. If it is not justified under the one it is under the other, taking the two together. You will find that judges and lawyers differ about it, but to-day it is conceded by everyone that the constitutional power exists.

Mr. HOPKINS. I suppose my friend will concede——

Mr. RAY of New York. Do not use up all my time, please. You simply seek to divert me from my argument.

Mr. HOPKINS. I beg your pardon.

Mr. RAY of New York. There are none so blind as those who will not see and do not desire to see.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is what I have been thinking for a long time.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now let me proceed. I say we have no constitutional power or right to enact this bill. I will print some of the authorities, because I have not time to read them now.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has occupied the floor thirty minutes.

Mr. RAY of New York. I can only use a few more minutes. In a case to which I will invite attention, Missouri v. Illinois and the sanitary district of Chicago—is the gentleman familiar with that case?

Mr. HOPKINS. I think I know it quite as well as my friend.

Mr. RAY of New York. Do not compare your knowledge. I simply inquired if you know of the case.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have read it.

Mr. RAY of New York. I concede that the gentleman from Illinois for legal knowledge, for acumen, for general intelligence, for health, for beauty, far exceeds the "gentleman from New York." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS (rising). I thank you.

Mr. RAY of New York (continuing). I concede all that. I asked him, "Are you familiar with that case?" The principle enunciated is what I call your attention to, and to dozens of other cases. I ask gentlemen who read the minority views, which I had the pleasure to prepare—of course I could not prepare minority views such as would have been prepared by the gentleman from Illinois if he had been on my side of the question and on the committee, but I did just as well as I could to read that case. I took every case in the books on condemnation by the General Government, and on page 8 of the minority views you will find the cases, leading cases, where the Government of the United States has exercised the power of eminent domain.

Now, I call your attention to our constitutional power in regard to our public lands—and our fathers when they wrote that instrument wrote wisely. They knew what they were doing; they knew what they intended to do. They were opposed to the feudal system. They were opposed to having large tracts of land owned by a few people in this country, opposed to having the ownership of land in the hands of few persons, as was the case in England. They wanted the land to be held by the people. They knew we owned a vast tract of land beyond the Ohio River; that it belonged to the people of this nation. They undoubtedly foresaw that not far in the future we would own other lands, as we have. They knew that we were a sovereign nation. They knew that we had all the powers of a sovereign nation. They knew we could do what we wished with our own. They knew that as a sovereign power we could sell or rent our public lands; that we could improve our public lands, and that we could build upon those lands homes and fences, houses and barns; as a sovereign power that we could rent them to our citizens for farming and other purposes.

They knew all that, and look to the debates of Congress and look to the debates of our fathers when they framed the Constitution and you will find that what I say is true—they opposed the ownership of all the land by a few persons. Now, what did they do? Did they say we could do anything with our public lands we saw fit? Not at all, but in defining the power of Congress over these public lands they restricted our power. Here is what they said: "The Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting territory or other property." "Shall have the power to dispose of." Why limit it to disposition? There is no lawyer on this floor who does not know that if I give you power of attorney to dispose of my land you have the power to sell; that you have no power to rent and no power to improve it in any respect. When our fathers wrote those words "dispose of" they put them in because the words were restrictive of the powers we otherwise should have possessed.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. Just for a moment.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman admit the power to tax?

Mr. RAY of New York. Tax what?
Mr. FINLEY. In the Territories.
Mr. RAY of New York. Tax the public lands?
Mr. FINLEY. Tax anything.
Mr. RAY of New York. It never has been considered whether the Congress of the United States can tax public lands of the United States or not.
Mr. FINLEY. Not the public lands, but everything.
Mr. RAY of New York. I think it would be ridiculous to entertain such an idea.
Mr. FINLEY. Imports and other things.
Mr. RAY of New York. I can not yield further; I am not to be diverted from my argument by questions such as that.
Mr. FINLEY. I heard your argument here a year ago.
Mr. RAY of New York. I am not yielding for a speech now. Please do not interrupt.
Mr. FINLEY. Well.
Mr. RAY of New York. I can not yield for that purpose. Our fathers put that in as a restriction. But now let us come to another proposition, which immediately follows that. We never have exercised any further or greater power than that. Gentlemen on the committee, colleagues of mine for whom I have the highest regard and respect, have said, "Why, we survey our public lands." True. The power to survey is incidental to the power to dispose of. The power to survey must be exercised in order that we may intelligently dispose of our public lands. Will any gentleman here claim for an instant that we have the right, that the Congress of the United States has the right or the constitutional power to authorize some person, at the public expense, to go upon the public lands and take off the stones, where they are stony; plow them; fertilize them, where they need fertilization; build fences; build barns; build houses; lay them out in farms, and then rent them to A, B, or C; rent them to those who desire to come from the Eastern States and have a home at a cheap rental? Does any gentleman contend that?
Mr. SHAFROTH. Do you want an answer?
Mr. RAY of New York (continuing). There is no one but knows in his heart and good judgment that we have no such power as that. And our fathers when they framed and adopted the Constitution knowingly put those words "disposed of" in there, and so limited the power of Congress. They put them there to prevent the United States of America from ever reverting to the feudal system which prevailed in England, Germany, and in the old countries from which they fled. Read the history of the United States. Read the history of the American people and you will see that what I say is correct.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?
Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; if it is only a question, and a short one.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is very short. Can the gentleman find anything in the Madison debates that indicates that the fathers gave any such meaning to this clause as the gentleman now suggests? I have read them with great care on another proposition, but I do not recollect of seeing it.
Mr. RAY of New York. It was discussed when the Constitution was framed. The question was discussed, and I can point you to three or four different books where the question was discussed and the purpose of it. It is referred to by Professor Fiske.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. But he was not one of the fathers.
Mr. HOPKINS. And not a very good constitutional lawyer, either.
Mr. RAY of New York. No; he was not one of the fathers, but he was one of the writers. He wrote ably and intelligently about the fathers and about the history of New England and the United States, and he gives us a great deal of information on the subject, and he refers us to authorities which are useful. We are now coming to the other provisions of the bill. In order to irrigate in Nevada they must condemn lands and water in California. The gentleman from that great State of 38,000 people, about one-fifth as many people as I have in my congressional district, says that in a few years if they can not have irrigation and they lose the irrigation they have now Nevada will dry up.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman permit me a question?
Mr. RAY of New York. I can not keep yielding in this way.
Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman this question. I would like to hear him on the question whether or not this bill involves a public use.
Mr. RAY of New York. I am coming to that, but here are gentlemen every little while asking me questions and trying to divert me. I will come to that question as rapidly as I can. The gentleman from Nevada says in effect, not words, that Nevada, or a large portion of it, can, at the public expense, be made to blossom like the rose if the Eastern taxpayers are willing to pay for the improvement and give up their share of the public moneys derived from the sale of public lands. "Well," we say, "is there water in Nevada? Is there water there that you can apply to the irrigation of the arid land?" "No." "Where will you get the water?" "We propose to go into the State of California, on the eastern slope of her mountains, and there, if they will not give or sell it to us, we propose to condemn the right to take the head waters of those streams, conduct that water into the State of Nevada to use for irrigation purposes. If need be, we will take it against the will of the State of California and then distribute it over the arid lands of Nevada for the purposes of irrigation."
Gentlemen who favor this bill propose that the Government shall go up into the foot hills of the Rocky Mountains for a supply of water, and if the State will not surrender the right to the Government to store and dam up these head waters of the streams, they propose to go into the State courts and condemn these water rights for the purpose of irrigation; not in the State where they propose to irrigate, but in Colorado they propose to condemn lands and water rights to irrigate arid lands in Nebraska or Kansas, or it may be in some States farther north. They are going to take and condemn water and water rights in one State, store the water for purposes of irrigation in some other State, or in two or three States. What does the proposition lead to? It leads to this question: Has the General Government of the United States power, in the exercise of its sovereign rights, to go into a State and condemn water or water rights, store that water, and then conduct that water where they please for the purpose of irrigating arid lands belonging to the Government for purposes of sale to private owners?
If we have that power, then the General Government has the power to go into every State of this Union, to go to the headwaters of the Mohawk River, to the headwaters of the Hudson River and store those waters, divert them into Lake Ontario, divert them into a canal that shall flow across the State of Massachusetts and empty into Boston Harbor. If they have that right, they may take the headwaters of the Ohio River, divert those waters into some stream that shall empty into the Potomac River or the Chesapeake Bay. You may say to me, gentlemen, if you please, that such a scheme is impracticable. That I might concede, but that is not the question; it is a question of power, and I say that constitutionally, in my judgment, it can not be done. Now, let me tell you why.
Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me?
Mr. RAY of New York. No; I can not yield.
Mr. MONDELL. But the gentleman has got a bogy man that is not in the bill.
Mr. RAY of New York. I have got no bogy man.
Mr. MONDELL. Whereabouts does the gentleman find any such provision as he is arguing? Whereabouts in the bill is there anything that attempts to give the Federal Government any right to condemn or to take any water right or do anything which an individual could not do? Will the gentleman point out any place or any provision for the Federal Government to do anything that I could not do if I owned the public land?
Mr. RAY of New York. Do you say there is nothing in this bill that provides for condemnation?
Mr. MONDELL. The bill provides explicitly that even an appropriation of water can not be made except under State law.
Mr. RAY of New York. Let me see. There is one great trouble with the bill——
Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman having argued the other side of the question, would now take the opposite ground.
Mr. RAY of New York. I do no such a thing.
Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman must adopt one or the other view; he can not adopt both.
Mr. RAY of New York. Now, when the gentleman gets into a condition of rest I will read the bill.
But I must not forget to state to the House one other provision of this bill which I had passed over in my haste, and that is that wherever the water does not fall out of the heavens and they do not find it anywhere on the surface of the earth they are going to sink artesian wells. So that they are going to construct reservoirs and then sink artesian wells and pump water out of the earth and store it therein at the public expense. Why, sir, up in New York and Pennsylvania and New England we have to dig our own artesian wells. And that is one ground of complaint that I have against this bill—that it does not propose at the public expense to sink any artesian wells for Pennsylvania and New York and New England farmers. Now, let me read section 7 of the bill:

That where in carrying out the provisions of this act it becomes necessary to acquire any rights or property, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to acquire the same for the United States by purchase or by condemnation under judicial process, and to pay from the reclamation fund the sums which may be needed for that purpose.

This is the unconstitutional provision to which I refer. It can not be enforced. I refer to my report, which I will print as a part of my remarks, as it contains all the authorities.
And still the gentleman who reported this bill and who has made an hour's speech in favor of it, says there is not anything of that kind in the bill. I do not blame him for being confused. In the Fifty-fifth Congress they introduced a bill of this character. I was on the committee, and I prepared a report against it. In the Fifty-seventh Congress they introduced another bill, and I condemned it; and then they undertook to improve it, and introduced another bill. I condemned that also. And then the Senate bill came over here and they changed that. I do not wonder at the confused state of the gentleman's mind and that he has forgotten to an extent that they have in this bill a provision which purports to confer upon the Secretary of the Interior power to condemn water and water rights for the purpose of carrying out this scheme.

Mr. MONDELL. Wherever the State law gives him authority to do so.

Mr. RAY of New York. But it does not say so. The trouble is that the bill does not say so.

Another thing. No State law does, no State law can—I do not care who may frame it—give any power of condemnation of private property unless it be for a public use.

And now I come to a question propounded to me by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BELLAMY rose.

Mr. RAY of New York. Let me answer the gentleman from Maine. I trust the gentleman from North Carolina will not interrupt me in a legal argument.

I affirm that the use proposed by this bill is not a public use and you can not make it a public use. What is a public use? Something that is for the benefit of all the people of the sovereignty. In a State it is a public use if it is for the benefit of all the people of the State. In saying this I do not mean that all the people must use it, but all the people must have a right in it—must have a right to have the beneficial use of it. Then the use must be continuous in its nature. Now, let me read from Cooley's Constitutional Limitations. Cooley has always been supposed to be good authority. He remains good authority with me. He remains good authority with the Supreme Court of the United States, because they hold the same doctrine that he does. Now let me read:

Nor could it be—

He is stating the right of eminent domain, and what is a public use—

Nor could it be of importance that the public would receive incidental benefits such as usually spring from the improvement of lands or the establishment of prosperous private enterprises. The public use implies a possession, occupation, and enjoyment of the land by the public at large or by public agencies; and a due protection to the rights of private property will preclude the Government from seizing it in the hands of the owner and turning it over to another on vague grounds of public benefit to spring from the more profitable use to which the latter may devote it.

That quotation is exactly in point. Let us see what you propose to do. For the purpose of a public building—for the purpose of supplying Washington city, which is on the public domain or territory under the seclusive jurisdiction of Congress, with water for all the people to drink—for the purpose of building a courthouse for the United States, or for a public park for the people, or for the purpose of a national cemetery, as at Gettysburg, where all the people may go, where all the people may admire, where all the people have the right to share the benefits, the General Government may condemn the land. Those uses are a public use and for a public purpose, but that is not the purpose here. What do you propose to do?

Now, follow me carefully. Build great reservoirs for the storage of water, build canals, take the water to the arid lands for the irrigation thereof, and distribute that water for the purpose of irrigating this public land. Is the United States to keep that land? Is the United States Government to use that land? No. The moment your irrigation works are constructed and your water stored, you say that private individuals may come upon that land that is to be irrigated, that they may take the land in plots not exceeding 160 acres, I think it is. They are to become the owners of that land and have an interest in that water right, and that such private owners, after a little, shall control the water rights. The land to be irrigated and to be benefited is to pass to private ownership, into private hands. So we irrigate, not for the public, but for speculative purposes, for the purpose of bringing settlers.

Mr. GILBERT. What private property has been taken in the process?

Mr. RAY of New York. Why, the bill proposes to go to the headwaters of streams and wherever they see fit and condemn land and condemn water rights for the purpose of storage, to be carried through canals to arid lands. Now, if we were to keep those lands and the United States were to run them, till them, and rent them, then this would be a public use.

Mr. GILBERT. And those running streams——

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, but that is not the proposition. We are to sell those lands.

Mr. GILBERT. But those running streams in the States are not private property.

Mr. RAY of New York. That depends altogether on the character of the stream, and the very fact that they are not private property repels the idea of condemnation; and when not public property—most of these small streams are not—we can not condemn for such a use as is proposed, and now the objection comes in. In some instances we are going to take the springs, the small streams that supply the big rivers, divert the water to the irrigation of arid lands far distant, and deprive the adjacent land owners of the water. The large rivers are public streams, in which we have a right as a government under our interstate and foreign commerce powers, under the Constitution; but in the small streams and little springs and rivulets and all that we have no right except to keep them open and undefiled and not interfered with, in order that interstate commerce may not be interrupted or obstructed. May this Government deprive an owner of land of water for his farm in order to irrigate the farms to be sold or given by the Government to others?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What are the rights of riparian proprietors in that vicinity?

Mr. RAY of New York. The rights of riparian owners in Colorado and the mining States are different from what they are in the East, South, and other sections. The riparian rights of the Government of the United States exist under the common law as the Supreme Court applies it and is the common-law rule, which is that you may take water in these public streams and divert it temporarily for the use of the owner along their banks, and then you must restore it. That is not the rule in the mining States, but it is the rule of the Government, except as the General Government recognizes the rule adopted in those States in the States.

In Colorado and in California and some of those States, by virtue of necessity, they recognize a different rule. They say that the first appropriator of the water, to the extent of the appropriation, has the right to it as against all comers, so that if a dozen men came and started their mines and took all the water in the stream, all the water there was in a river, and some one came later and established himself lower down, he had no right and has no right in the water, because of the prior appropriation. Now, I have not time to go further into details, but I point out in my report the wide difference in the rules. So, you see, here you have a proposition right in the face of the law, right in the face of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, as to riparian rights.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, I can not.

Mr. MONDELL. Just one question.

Mr. RAY of New York. Where you propose to take the water and land of private persons, condemn it for an alleged public use, a use that is not a public use, for the reason that we do not propose to keep these lands when we have provided irrigation for them, we exceed our constitutional powers. We can not execute that part of this proposed law. We propose to sell the land and water rights to private owners. Therefore, as I have stated in the minority views, this is not a public use, and I cite a dozen cases proving it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question right there?

Mr. RAY of New York. I decline to yield. I now call attention to another phase of this controversy. That is this: The State of Colorado, in the exercise of what she claims to be her sovereign rights, has diverted for purposes of irrigation in Colorado the head waters of one or more of our great streams.

Mr. GILBERT. Would the reservoir be public property?

Mr. RAY of New York. The reservoir itself, if constructed on public land, would be public property, of course.

Mr. BELL. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. RAY of New York. I can not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BELL. I should like to suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not want your suggestion at this time. Now, when I have declined to yield, please let that end it. You know that my time is limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The Chair trusts gentlemen will not interrupt the speaker without his permission.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, I have just come to the statement of the case, and I want the House to understand it. In the State of Colorado the legislature, claiming the right to irrigate the arid lands of that State, has diverted the headwaters of one or more great rivers that naturally flow into and through the State of Kansas. They have substantially made one or more of these rivers dry at certain seasons of the year, so that the people of Kansas do not find water in the stream for agricultural purposes, nor for purposes of irrigation in Kansas. What has the State of Kansas done? She has brought suit in the United States Court against the State of Colorado to enjoin her from thus diverting, retaining, and using, for purposes of irrigation, the water that the God of nature designed should run through the State of Kansas.

The State of Colorado demurred to the complaint and the case came to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the demurrer has been overruled, the court thus holding, in effect, that Colorado has no such right to divert and withhold those waters for the irrigation of her own arid lands to the detriment of Kansas. We had better await the final decision of that case before enacting a law of this kind.

The God of nature made the great Mississippi River run from its headwaters in Lake Itasca through to the Gulf of Mexico, and when we formed this Republic we did not take away from the citizens of Mississippi the right to have those waters run down to the Gulf forever, and Congress can not take away or interfere with the right. And so with the headwaters of the Missouri River. We can not store them or take them away or interfere with that right. Why? Because they run through States of this Union that we have recognized as States, that we have ordained as States, and to which we have given the rights of sovereign States.

I read here some comments in cases and on the principle involved, by C. F. Randolph, of the New York bar.

PART SECOND.—III.

KANSAS v. COLORADO.

THE CASE STATED.

30. The bill of complaint in Kansas v. Colorado recites that the Arkansas River rises in Colorado, runs a long course therein, and then traverses Kansas in a course of 310 miles. It alleges that the State of Colorado itself, and many persons acting under its authority, are even now diverting such quantities of water for irrigation purposes "that no water flows in the bed of said river from the State of Colorado into the State of Kansas during the annual growing season, and the underflow of said river in Kansas is diminishing and continuing to diminish."

But be it noted that for diversions under existing grants no relief is sought in the present suit. The gravamen of the bill is the allegation that Colorado intends to maintain the present diversion by renewing grants as they expire by limitation, and to increase it by new irrigation works, both public and private. And the bill asserts that if the diversion continues to increase the bottom lands of the Arkansas Valley in Kansas "will be injured to an enormous extent, and a large part thereof will be utterly ruined, and will become deserted and be a part of an arid desert."

31. Colorado demurs to the bill for ten specific causes. The seventh and tenth allege defects in pleading, and are not material to this general discussion. The first six causes present the objection that the bill does not disclose a controversy between States within the meaning of the Federal Constitution. It is contended that any injury resulting from the acts complained of creates, at most, a controversy between persons in Colorado who actually divert water, and persons in Kansas who suffer from the diversion.

A like contention was made in Missouri v. Illinois, where a State sued on account of threatened depreciation of the quality of waters used by its citizens, a case not substantially different from a threatened diminution of supply, but the court said, "That suits brought by individuals, each for personal injuries threatened or received, would be wholly inadequate and disproportionate remedies requires no comment;"[1] and this ruling is even more pertinent here, for in the Missouri case a multitude of suitors would at least have found a single defendant in the drainage canal corporation, while here a multitude must essay the difficult, if not impossible, task of apportioning liability among a multitude of defendants in Colorado. Conceding that a State can not properly implead another when adequate relief is otherwise obtainable, it is not perceived that the case at bar should be dismissed on this grounds, and so we pass on to the question whether Kansas and Colorado are actually in controversy.

32. Kansas first alleges injury to a small tract of land, the site of a State reformatory. Here is a proprietary interest on account of which the State may bring suit, but, assuming for the moment the liability of Colorado, judgment on this score alone would be a techinal victory for Kansas of little value. It would be intolerable to enjoin Colorado from bringing vast tracts of arid land into cultivation merely to enable Kansas to raise vegetables on a reformatory farm.

The real motive of the suit lies in the allegation of damage threatened to a large section of territory held in private ownership. To avert this damage Kansas comes into court as a political corporation asserting a right to protect its community. If it be argued that as a State can not collect debts due its citizens from another State[2] it can not defend their landed interests, the sufficient answer in the case at bar is that the nature and magnitude of these collective interests make their preservation a matter of public concern. And, if the support of precise authority be required for this statement, it may be found in Missouri v. Illinois, where the court said:

"It is true that no question of boundary is involved, nor of direct property rights belonging to the complainant State. But it must surely be conceded that, if the comfort and health of the inhabitants of a State are threatened, the State is the proper party to represent and defend them. * * * The health and comfort of the large communities inhabiting those parts of the State situated on the Mississippi River are not alone concerned, but contagious and typhoidal diseases introduced in the river communities may spread themselves throughout the territory of the State. Moreover, substantial impairment of the health and prosperity of the towns and cities of the State situated on the Mississippi River, including its commercial metropolis, injuriously affects the entire State."[3]

33. Beyond the public and private lands specified, there is really involved in this suit an interest which we hope the Supreme Court will place definitely among the rights of a State maintainable in interstate suits, a peculiar public interest in water, wholly independent of any private interest or right therein that may happen to be vested by local law, and which is not limited by the use actually made of water through diversion, but is defined so broadly that it will embrace even the maintenance of climatic conditions due to the presence of water. Always a State should be competent to assert this interest, except, of course, where it must yield to Federal power in respect of navigation.[4]

[1] 180 U. S., 240.
[2] Supra, sec. 11.
[3] 180 U. S., 241.
[4] Infra sec. 34.

I conclude that the pleadings in the case at bar present a controversy between States. Kansas properly complains as well in its political as in its proprietary capacity; Colorado is properly impleaded, because the diversions of water complained of are and can be effected only through State authorization.

THE GOVERNING PRINCIPLE.

34. Kansas and Colorado are now joined in controversy, and it is material to determine the governing rule. This inquiry necessitates an appreciation of some elementary principles of the law of waters affecting States of the Union both in their domestic administration and in their relations to the Federal Government and to other States. Of the first case it is sufficient to say that, of course, State control over waters in respect of persons and property within its jurisdiction is determined by State laws.

Whatever may be the power of a State in respect of waters it must be exercised in subordination to that Federal authority derived from the commerce clause of the Constitution.

"The jurisdiction of the General Government over interstate commerce and its highways," says the Supreme Court, "vests in that Government the right to take all needful measures to preserve the navigability of the navigable water courses of the country, even against any State action."[1]

But in discussing the law of waters suitable to the great arid region of the United States, we should leave this peculiar Federal interest in suspense. In this region irrigation is so vital, navigation, generally speaking, so negligible, that the Federal Government is willing to permit, nay, it should be eager to encourage the one with little regard for its effect on the other. And the Government loses nothing by this partiality, for should a State actually divert waters to the injury of navigation, it may intervene. Indeed, it appears that in acts of Congress permitting States to authorize the cutting of ditches through public lands the privilege does not carry a right to impair navigation.[2]

35. Regarding the position of a State in respect of waters on public lands of the United States that may happen to lie within its borders the Supreme Court says:

"In the absence of specific authority from Congress a State can not by its legislation destroy the right of the United States, as the owner of lands bordering on a stream, to the continued flow of its waters, so far, at least, as may be necessary for the beneficial uses of the Government property."[3]

But the question remains whether these public lands are so intimately connected with the sovereign, as distinguished from the proprietary interests of the United States, as to lie beyond the reach of the State's eminent domain. Personally I am of the opinion that these lands are not inevitably beyond the expropriating power of the States for all purposes.[4] I can conceive of cases where the public needs of a State should be held superior to the proprietary interests of the United States. But the point has not been determined by the Supreme Court,[1] and it is not necessary to discuss it here.

36. Coming to the measure of control over waters which one State can maintain against another, we find that in the case at bar Colorado arrogates the right to utilize every drop of water in that section of the Arkansas River basin lying within the State, regardless of the effect upon Kansas. This position is not merely a legal inference coming from the filing of a demurrer, and thus admitting technically the truth of the facts alleged in the bill of complaint. It is affirmed in the following causes of demurrer:

"Eighth. Because the acts and injuries complained of consist in the exercise of rights and the appropriation of water upon the national domain in conformity with and by virtue of divers acts of Congress in relation thereto. Ninth. Because the constitution of the State of Colorado declaring public property in the waters of its natural streams and sanctioning the right of appropriation was enacted pursuant to national authority, and ratified thereby at the time of the admission of the State into the Union."

So far as the eighth cause refers to present diversions of water it is to be noted that the suit of Kansas is not aimed at any irrigation interests in Colorado which may be defined as "vested," and in this discussion we shall not consider at length such interests in either State, being concerned chiefly with the public matter in controversy.

So far as the eighth cause insinuates that Congress, in authorizing diversions of water on the public domain, confers upon a State a right exclusive against other States, it must be objected that Congress does not, indeed it can not, thus exalt one State to the detriment of another. And the same objection rebukes the claim, advanced in the ninth cause of demurrer, that Congress, by approving the constitution of Colorado, has consecrated a right in the State to withhold water from its neighbors.

Stripped of all support from Federal statutes, which, I repeat, can not be invoked by one party to an interstate controversy as giving it legal advantage over another, it is perceived that Colorado is really insisting that this dispute between two States shall be determined by the law of one—that the constitution and statutes ordained by the people of Colorado for their own governance shall be accepted by the Supreme Court as the ruling law in a suit brought by Kansas. This position is untenable, as I have shown.[5]

37. Kansas opposes to Colorado's claim of monopoly what we may call a local theory of law, as distinguished from the general theory we shall consider later. This local theory is introduced by the statement that the land lying in Colorado and Kansas and drained by the Arkansas River and its affluents was brought within the domain of the United States partly by the Louisiana treaty and partly by treaty with Texas; that this land was included in the Territory of Kansas; that later a part was included in the State of Kansas and the remainder in the Territory, afterwards the State, of Colorado.

It is alleged that under the sovereignty of the United States the land became subject to the common law, and especially to the general rule that every riparian owner is entitled to the continued natural flow of a stream. And it is argued that when a section of United States territory is once subjected to this common-law rule the subsequent drawing of State lines across it leaves the old rule still effective as between the new States.

Even assuming that this argument would lead to a just decision in the case at bar, I am not sure that it would furnish a rule applicable throughout the Republic.

Suppose that after the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona are admitted to statehood a controversy like Kansas v. Colorado should arise between them, and it was found that the common-law rule did not prevail in that section of country prior to the admission of the States. Should the complaining State fail for this reason? If so, there is no uniform rule for the determination of interstate controversies in respect of waters. Yet a uniform rule is certainly desirable, and I believe that it is imperative, for the reason that the constitutional equality of the States requires that each subject of controversy shall be determined by a general principle of law, so that like rights and duties shall be attributed to each State.[6]

38. What general principle should the Supreme Court announce as the governing rule in Kansas v. Colorado?

[1] U. S. v. Rio Grande Irrigation Co., 174 U. S., 703.
[2] See U. S. v. Rio Grande Irrigation Co., 174 U. S., 706.
[3] U. S. v. Rio Grande Irrigation Co., 173 U. S., 703.
[4] See The Law of Eminent Domain, sec. 59.
[5] See Van Brocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U. S., 161.
[6] Supra, sec. 26.

"The unquestioned rule of the common law," says the court in a recent case, "was that every riparian owner was entitled to the continued natural flow of the stream. * * * While this is undoubted, and the rule obtains in those States of the Union which have simply adopted the common law, it is also true that as to every stream within its dominion a State may change this common-law rule, and permit the appropriation of the flowing waters for such purposes as it deems wise."[1]

In several States and Territories this common-law rule has been superseded by what is called "the doctrine of appropriation," the gist of which seems to be that the first comer may divert as much water from a stream as is necessary for the development of his mining or agricultural lands, whether these are adjacent to the stream or not, and later comers acquire rights in the order of priority.

The court will find no proper rule in a strict adherence to either of these doctrines. Approval of the common law might bar a State from a reasonable use of water for irrigation. Approval of the law of prior appropriation would encourage interstate races for water prizes, contrary to the fraternal purpose of the Federal compact. Furthermore, this law might permit a lower State to assert against an upper one a right to receive only so much water in a stream as is actually diverted from the stream. Such a rule would be unfair, even in the arid regions. In the country at large it would be most mischievous, because it ignores, among other things, the utility of streams for the transportation of logs, as natural drains, and their influence on climate.

39. From these inadequate theories of domestic law we turn to international law.

Complaints by one nation against another on account of diversion of water are not unknown. Our State Department has complained to Great Britain of an obstruction to the flow of a stream in Maine caused by acts committed in Canada, and to Mexico of the diversion of the waters of the Rio Grande.[2] Mexico has complained of diversion on this side of the boundary, and our Senate has under consideration the appointment of a commission to discuss international water rights with Canada.

The interesting point in such cases is the invocation of the principle of a common right in international water courses. In respect of navigation this right has long been asserted by enlightened jurists, and throughout the greater part of the civilized world it is now either respected on principle or secured by agreement. Serious diversions of international streams have been too infrequent, perhaps, to excite much attention, but were such a case brought to arbitration the tribunal would surely refuse to announce, as a principle of international law, that an upper State is entitled to divert all the water from a stream. It would probably affirm the right of the State to divert a reasonable quantity, subject always to the paramount interest of navigation.

40. The physical and political conditions which make the irrigation of our arid region so difficult an undertaking are nowhere paralleled in a civilized country more closely than in Australia, where, indeed, the union of the colonies under the constitution of the new Commonwealth was partly inspired by the desire to refer intercolonial disputes over waters to a common authority.[3] A learned commentator on the Australian constitution says:

"The consideration of the extent of the restriction imposed upon the Parliament of the Commonwealth by section 100[4] of the constitution involves the consideration of the question of the power of a State to authorize the diversion of the waters of a river flowing through it, or a diminution of their quality, to an extent which would affect the rights of riparian proprietors in another State.

There is not any restriction directly and expressly imposed by the Constitution upon the several States in respect of their use of the rivers of the Commonwealth for the purposes of conservation or irrigation, but it would be an anomalous result if each State has the power under the Constitution to divert the water of a river for the benefit of the residents of the State, or to diminish the quantity of it, to the detriment of the residents of another State, whether the river is navigable or not, and that the Parliament of the Commonwealth can not for any purpose that would be beneficial to all the States, or to a majority of them, do the same thing. It has already been stated that the imposition of the restriction imposed on the Parliament of the Commonwealth by section 100 implies that in the absence of any such restriction Parliament would have a larger power to control the use of the waters of the rivers of the Commonwealth than that which the Constitution has conferred upon it; and the terms in which the restriction is imposed indicate that such larger power would be exercisable by the Parliament of the Commonwealth as a part of its legislative power with respect to trade and commerce between the States and with other countries. But the Constitution has not conferred any legislative power upon the States with respect to such trade and commerce; and the power of the Parliament of the Commonwealth with respect to that matter is from the nature of the power necessarily exclusive.

If the several States were so many independent nations, any interference in one of the States with the waters of a river that flowed through that State and another State to an extent that would produce any damage to the riparian proprietors in the other State would be a matter of international complaint, for which redress in the last resort would be sought by war.

"But the States of the Commonwealth are constituent parts of the same nation, and any act on the part of any one of them which inflicts injury on the residents of another State of the Commonwealth, and which would be a matter of international complaint if the two States were separate and independent nations, is a matter for redress in the high court of the Commonwealth under the provision of the Constitution which confers upon that court jurisdiction in all matters between States. It has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States of America that under the provisions of the Constitution of that country which extend the judicial power of the United States to 'controversies between two or more States,' one State may file a bill in equity against another State to determine the question of a disputed boundary. Under the Constitution of the Commonwealth the high court has clearly jurisdiction to determine a similar dispute between two States of the Commonwealth, and it must as a logical sequence have jurisdiction of the question whether any portion of the territory within the boundaries of one State can be deprived of all that makes that portion of its territory valuable by the aggressive legislation of another State."[5]

The words I have italicized seem to anticipate for the high court of Australia a broader jurisdiction than our Supreme Court possesses,[6] and if this anticipation be realized it will be because the States of Australia are of lesser dignity than ours. In point of law the commonwealth of Australia is a colony of Great Britain, formed by the union of several colonies and receiving its constitution from the British Parliament, while sovereign States adopted our Constitution, reserving important powers to themselves. But the last sentence of Judge Clark's comment suggests a question within the jurisdiction of our Supreme Court; and I think it admits of but one answer.

Assuming that this question is involved in Kansas v. Colorado, the court should announce, as a general proposition of law, that one State can not maintain against another a right to divert all the water of an interstate stream within its dominions, and go on to complete an equitable rule for the enjoyment of interstate waters by declaring that, presumably, each riparian State may divert a portion. Thus the principle of proportional rights, commended by international law to independent sovereigns, will be adjudged to be the general rule between our States. This rule is not reducible to a practical formula. How it shall be applied in a given case, whether, peradventure, it shall be found applicable at all, will depend upon the result of a thorough investigation of the relative resources and needs of the States in controversy, for the equitable purpose of the rule would be defeated were its applications invariably treated as purely mathematical problems. The equitable right may differ widely from the mathematical proportion.

METHOD OF RELIEF.

41. Kansas prays that the State of Colorado be restrained from authorizing any person or corporation to divert water from the Arkansas River, except for domestic use; from granting any larger use, or any renewal of present irrigation privileges, and from constructing and operating irrigation works on State account.[1] In fact, the Supreme Court is asked bluntly to enjoin the legislature of Colorado from passing laws of a certain description.

Fortunately we need not inquire how the court would attempt to muzzle a State legislature or punish disobedient legislators for contempt.[2] Should the court decide that a further diversion of water will inflict an injury on Kansas, it can grant relief without impairing the sovereignty of Colorado, even if the legislature should be tempted to disregard the decision.

Conceding that an injunction against the State of Colorado could not be directed specifically to its legislature, it would nevertheless pave the way to adequate relief.

Our courts are incompetent to prevent the passage of an act by a sovereign legislature. This incompetency is common to courts the world over. But they are competent to declare a passed act to be no law. This competency is unique and is due to our peculiar custom of confiding to the judiciary the power of determining the obligations of constitutions.[3] The Supreme Court would not stretch its powers by ignoring statutes passed by Colorado in contempt of a decision stigmatizing them as violative of the constitutional equality subsisting between it and another State. And then the court could prevent any State official or private person from diverting water under the pretended authority of an act.

This coercion of the servants or grantees of the State need not attaint its dignity in any forbidden manner. A court that has given judgment in ejectment against the commandant of a United States military station and cemetery at the suit of a claimant, despite the protest of the Federal Government,[4] will find a way to prevent a person in Colorado from bringing water into a ditch.

Relief for the complainant in the case at bar seems to require no more serious intervention in State affairs than was contemplated in Missouri v. Illinois. As the court there denied the power of a State legislature to authorize a nuisance to property in a neighbor State, so here it may deny the power to authorize what is, in effect, a trespass upon such property. In Missouri v. Illinois, the court said:[5]

"We are dealing with the case of a bill alleging in express terms that damage and irreparable injury will naturally and necessarily be occasioned by acts of the defendants, and where the defendants have chosen to have their rights disposed of, so far as the present hearing is concerned, upon the assertions of this bill."

And in that case the demurrers were overruled and leave given to the defendants to file answers to the bill. If the case of Kansas v. Colorado takes this course the principle of proportional rights in interstate waters will be established, leaving the question as to its application in the case at bar to be determined in further proceedings.

41*a*. The greater part of sections 30-41 were substantially finished when, on April 7, the Supreme Court gave its opinion in Kansas v. Colorado, and I let them stand because, while the court overrules the demurrer of Colorado, it suspends judgment, not only on the merits of the case, but on the main questions of law. Chief Justice Fuller says:

"Applying the principles settled in previous cases, we have no special difficulty with the bare question whether facts might not exist which would justify our interposition, while the manifest importance of the case and the necessity of the ascertainment of all the facts before the propositions of law can be satisfactorily dealt with lead us to the conclusion that the cause should go to issue and proofs before final decision. * * *

"Without subjecting the bill to minute criticism, we think its averments sufficient to present the question as to the power of one State of the Union to wholly deprive another of the benefit of water from a river rising in the former, and, by nature, flowing into and through the latter, and that, therefore, this court, speaking broadly, has jurisdiction.

"We do not pause to consider the scope of the relief which it might be possible to accord on such a bill. Doubtless the specific prayers of this bill are in many respects open to objection, but there is a prayer for general relief, and under that, such appropriate decree as the facts might be found to justify, could be entered, if consistent with the case made by the bill, and not inconsistent with the specific prayers in whole or in part, if that were also essential. Taylor v. Insurance Company, 9 How., 390, 406; Daniell, Ch. Pr. (4th Am. ed.), 380. * * *

"Sitting, as it were, as an international, as well as a domestic tribunal, we apply Federal law, State law, and international law, as the exigencies of the particular case may demand, and we are unwilling, in this case, to proceed on the mere technical admissions made by the demurrer. Nor do we regard it as necessary, whatever imperfections a close analysis of the pending bill may disclose, to compel its amendment at this stage of the litigation. We think proof should be made as to whether Colorado is herself actually threatened to wholly exhaust the flow of the Arkansas River in Kansas; whether what is described in the bill as the "underflow" is a subterranean stream flowing in a known and defined channel, and not merely water percolating through the strata below; whether certain persons, firms, and corporations in Colorado must be made parties hereto; what lands in Kansas are actually situated on the banks of the river, and what, either in Colorado or Kansas, are absolutely dependent on water therefrom: the extent of the watershed or the drainage area of the Arkansas River; the possibilities of the maintenance of a sustained flow through the control of flood waters; in short, the circumstances, a variation in which might induce the court to either grant, modify, or deny the relief sought or any part thereof.

IV.—Comprehensive Irrigation.

42. The affirmance of a right in each State traversed by an interstate stream to a reasonable use of its waters might of itself somewhat embarrass the further irrigation of arid lands by afflicting States with uncertainty in the face of a substantial yet unascertained limitation upon their powers of diversion.

It is to be hoped that this embarrassment will be sufficiently serious to compel the adoption of means whereby the reasonable apportionment of water among the States of the arid region shall be effected under a comprehensive system of irrigation for which science must present the plans and law provide for their execution. While understanding that no scheme, however admirable in theory, is likely to remove all interstate differences regarding the use of water in an arid region, it should be possible to devise a system that will impound the available supply and distribute it with approximate fairness.[1] A system broad and far-reaching in conception, looking ultimately to the utilization of all available waters, and taking no account of State lines except in the important matter of apportionment.

43. The first question of law in regard to the system is whence shall come the power to authorize it. Not unnaturally there is some disposition to turn to the Federal Government. As the proprietor of vast tracts of arid land within the States, and as the ruler of Territories which should be included within the system, the direct interest of this Government is very great, to say nothing of its general concern in the opening of new regions to settlement.

But the system will necessarily affect property within State jurisdiction, and the Federal Government is incompetent to enter a State and override its laws in order to promote irrigation. The implications of the Constitution do not confer upon Congress any power in respect of State waters except in the matter of navigation.

Perceiving the inability of the Federal Government to invade a State and distribute its waters, and realizing the inability of the States to secure an equitable apportionment of water by independent action, we are led to inquire whether the requisite authority for comprehensive irrigation may not be derived from a compact between the States interested, in which the Territories, or the United States as their representative, shall join. In Article I, section 10 of the Constitution, we read:

"No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation * * * No State shall without the consent of Congress * * * enter into an agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign power."

The distinction between the "treaty, alliance, or confederation" absolutely forbidden, and the "agreement or compact" conditionally permitted is not obscure. The United States will not tolerate an imperium in imperio, or any combination of States against other States, or any connection between a State and a foreign country. But compacts not compromising the supremacy of the United States over the several States, or the equality of the States among themselves, may be made with the consent of Congress. And it seems that in some cases this consent need not be given in advance, as where the "agreement relates to a matter which could not well be considered until its nature is fully developed," and sometimes, indeed, consent may be established by implication.[2]

Compacts or agreements between States have occasionally been made, and usually deal with boundary questions. But there is no reason why States should not combine to secure a more equitable enjoyment of a common interest in water than is attainable by independent action, and I venture to outline a plan whereby this object may be realized.

44. Let the States and Territories interested make a compact creating a public corporation for the promotion of irrigation. This corporation shall be charged, at all events, with the planning, constructing, and maintaining of a comprehensive system, and with the general apportionment of water among the several parties to the compact. But it may appear that the local distribution of a State's share will be best administered at the State's discretion, leaving it free to utilize public or private agencies acting under its own laws and customs.

The governing body of the corporation must be impartial as between the States, and this requisite suggests that the power of appointing its members be conferred upon the Federal Government, which shall select them from nonresidents of the States interested.

The governing body must be inspired by the best scientific knowledge, and this points to the selection of some of its members at least from the corps of scientists and engineers in the Federal service. Each State should have a representative near the governing body for purposes of suggestion and consultation.

Considerations of economy and of normal development require that the work of actual construction shall be gradual, but surveys should be made at once for a system adequate to collect and conserve the whole supply of water available for irrigation, and locations for reservoirs and arterial canals be preempted by acquisition, if on private, by reservation, if on public land.

45. The powers of the corporation would depend, of course, upon the compact and upon such ancillary State and Federal legislation as might be advisable, and any suit at law involving their exercise would be justiciable in the Federal courts. One power, however, should be specially remarked even in this brief sketch—the eminent domain. States wherein irrigation is deemed of vital importance are wont to authorize the expropriation of land for the necessary works, and the Supreme Court has sustained State tribunals in treating this as a taking for public use.[3]

The power of expropriation must be enjoyed by the corporation in question, and it must emanate from the States, because the Federal Government is not empowered to exert its eminent domain in a State except for Federal uses. Now, it is settled that a State can neither lend its eminent domain to promote the public uses of another State, nor exert it in another to promote its own, for each person holds his property subject only to the needs of his own sovereign. Yet the corporation must be free to locate irrigation works and provide for the distribution of water, regardless of State lines; for example, it may be advisable to build a reservoir in Colorado and utilize the water in Kansas. At first blush this might seem irregular, but, comprehending that each reservoir and canal is but a section of a great system intended to distribute to each State a fair proportion of interstate water, not otherwise obtainable, it is perceived that there is really no question of expropriation for foreign use; there is a joint exercise of the eminent domain by several States for the common benefit.

Some years ago I inquired "whether an undertaking considered as a whole may not be a public use common to two States, so that joint and interdependent grants of the eminent domain may cure deficiencies incident to independent grants."[1] Such a possibility is plainly contemplated in the following observation of the Supreme Court regarding a supposed case calling for a joint use of State powers, including, in all probability, the eminent domain:

"If the bordering line of two States should cross some malarious and disease producing district, there could be no possible reason, on any conceivable public grounds, to obtain the consent of Congress for the bordering States to agree to unite in draining the district, and thus removing the cause of disease."[2]

In case the exigencies of the system demand the appropriation of private irrigation works here and there, these may be taken on payment of just compensation.

46. I shall not consider now the problems of finance, or the practical rule for the just apportionment of water, or the method of dealing with vested rights in private works of irrigation and with the public domain of the United States, but we may anticipate that a disinterested corporation of comprehensive scope and power will handle all vexatious questions with greater skill than can be applied under present conditions, which, if report be true, too often encourage a rough contest for water. My interest in the practical side of irrigation is satisfied for the present by a very broad suggestion of method for effectuating the principle of proportional rights in interstate waters which, I trust, will yet be declared by the Supreme Court in Kansas v. Colorado.

V.—General Conclusions.

47. The principle of proportional rights in interstate waters is of far-reaching importance. We Americans are coming to realize, what has long since impressed itself in crowded countries, that consumption tends to press more and more seriously upon very important national resources. We are beginning to perceive that prevision and thrift must replace the hand-to-mouth habit so naturally acquired by a small community scattered through a vast and rich domain, and so difficult to shake off as the community increases. Among all our resources water is unique. It is necessary to our existence; for some of its utilities there is no possible substitute; it is the only one that distributes itself.

Evidently a resource of such transcendent value and peculiar distribution may be of interstate concern in various ways. The Supreme Court has already recognized a State's interest in the quality of interstate waters by denying the right of another State to authorize their pollution to the danger point.[3] Regarding the quantity of water, it may be decided some day that States traversed by an interstate stream have an interest in the conservation of its supply that will enable a lower State to restrain an upper one from permitting the depletion of its sources through the wasteful cutting of forests. But be this as it may, actual diversion by an upper State to an unreasonable and injurious extent should be preventible through interstate suit, whether the object of diversion be the irrigation of arid lands, as in Kansas v. Colorado, or the supply of cities, or the creation of hydraulic power.

48. Conversely, it is quite as important that an upper riparian State should be entitled to effect a reasonable diversion of water. While it may be prevented from abusing a natural advantage by diverting all the water, the use of this should not be prohibited altogether. Upper States must not be barred from taking a reasonable advantage of their situation in order that the lower States may enjoy an opportunity to divert the entire natural flow.

To illustrate the general subject, let us consider the case of Pine and Muller v. The City of New York, just decided by the United States Supreme Court.[4] The Byram River is a small stream, the west branch of which rises in New York, the east in Connecticut.

These branches meet at a point in Connecticut, whence the stream runs a short course to Long Island Sound. The city, acting under the authority of the New York legislature, has nearly completed a dam across the west branch, a few hundred feet from the Connecticut line, for the purpose of impounding and diverting water to the use of its inhabitants. The city admits that at certain times, perhaps, all the water above the dam will be diverted, leaving the stream to be supplied from the east branch and from such water of the west branch as may rise below the dam. The plaintiffs own land on the main stream, which will suffer substantial injury by reason of the diversion.

They could not agree with the city in regard to compensation. They refused to go to the New York courts for an assessment of damages under the New York statutes, and filed a bill for injunction in the circuit court of the United States. The injunction was granted;[6] it was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals,[5] and the case was brought to the Supreme Court on certiorari. The court found that the plaintiffs had not been diligent in asserting their rights, but had allowed large expenditures to be made on a work of great public concern without due protest. For this reason it remanded the case to the circuit court in order that the plaintiffs' damages, if any, might be ascertained. After damages shall have been assessed, either in equity or, if the plaintiffs prefer, by a jury, the city upon paying them will be entitled to divert the water. If it does not pay within a fixed time it will be enjoined.

49. The disposition of Pine v. New York made it unnecessary for the court to decide the interesting questions of law argued, but it said, speaking by Justice Brewer:

"We assume without deciding that, as found by the circuit court, the plaintiffs will suffer substantial damage by the proposed diversion of the water of the West Branch. Also, without deciding, we assume that, although the West Branch above the dam and all the sources of supply of water to that branch are within the limits of the State of New York, it has no power to appropriate such water or prevent its natural flow through its accustomed channel into the State of Connecticut; that the plaintiffs have a legal right to the natural flow of the water through their farms in the State of Connecticut, and can not be deprived of the right by and for the benefit of the city of New York by any legal proceedings either in Connecticut or New York; and that a court of equity, at the instance of the plaintiffs, at the inception and before any action had been taken by the city of New York, would have restrained all interference with such natural flow of the water."

If the above statement presents the mature opinion of the court, it is conceivable that a single riparian proprietor in one State may retard the growth, if not menace the health of a great city in another State by preventing access to a supply of water which may be the only one available from an economic, perhaps even from a physical standpoint.

May such a hardship be avoided by holding that the property right of the riparian owner is merely in the water itself, and not in its flow; and that,

[1] Mr. F. H. Newell, of the United States Geological Survey, says that private enterprise "has already built irrigation works sufficient to utilize nearly the whole available flow of the streams in the arid regions during the irrigation season. Further progress in irrigation can only come through the storage of flood waters in reservoirs" (Irrigation in the United States, p. 405). In regard to the volume of these floods President Roosevelt says in his message of December 3, 1901: "The western half of the United States would sustain a population greater than that of our whole country to-day if the waters that now run to waste were stored and used for irrigation."

therefore, while this water is in an upper State it may be taken for public use by that State? If so, the owner is simply in the position of a nonresident whose property is subject to expropriation in the State where it lies, or, as we should say here, where it is caught, and he must submit to the rule of that State's laws. This view was advanced by Judge Wheeler, of the circuit court of appeals, who said in a dissenting opinion in Pine v. New York:

"The defendant has done nothing in question here outside the State of New York. The deprivation of water complained of was wholly within that State, and if the plaintiffs have any rights in the water taken they exist in that State and were subject to and were taken under the eminent domain of that State."

I do not think the Supreme Court should approve or does approve Judge Wheeler's proposition. On the contrary, I think that the assumptions of the court in Pine v. New York, which I have quoted, must be accepted as positive affirmations of law. It must be understood that when a private suitor is quick to defend his interests the court will neither override the common law in respect of riparian rights, nor revolutionize the theory of the eminent domain by permitting one State to condemn property in another, even to prevent the embarrassment of a great community by a stubborn individual.

Yet, when we contemplate the fraternal relation of the States, and the welding of their people into a single nationality by a common allegiance, it is inconceivable that any one of these States should be barred from making a use of water, thoroughly reasonable from any standpoint and vitally important from its own, by a citizen in another State who chooses to oppose his petty interest. In my opinion such a hardship can be avoided by invoking the principle of proportional rights in interstate waters which I have endeavored to establish.

If a State be pressed by reasonable necessity to divert water from an interstate stream and find its purpose likely to be balked by persons in a lower State, let it file an original bill in equity against that State for the ascertainment of its proportional right.

In adjudicating this interstate suit the court will be free to apply the principles of international law[1] and will ascertain, approximately, the share of the complainant State in the stream. The interstate controversy will then be determined. But the court may deem it inequitable to allow the complainant to take its share, apportioned with respect to the board requirements of States, without regard to private interests in the lower State.

For I am not prepared to say that when the rule of proportional rights is applied to a stream by allowing to the upper State—for example, one-third of the volume—it should be presumed that a riparian proprietor in the lower State was never entitled at common law to but two-thirds of the actual flow, the other third having come by grace. Generally speaking, I prefer to consider an interstate water suit as a method for relieving a public emergency and laying down a rule for public guidance with the least possible disturbance of established private interests in either State, and this view is justified on broad principles of public policy. If, therefore, the Supreme Court finds that persons in the lower State will be deprived of property by the diversion of water, it may order an assessment of damages and their payment by the complainant State before it exercises its rights.

While the result will be that private property in one State is, in fact, taken for public use in another, there will be no technical violation of the law of eminent domain. The case will be not unlike an international negotiation culminating in a treaty, wherein private interests are subordinated to public exigencies with this difference, perhaps, that here the persons affected may be assured of receiving full compensation.

50. By the preservation of sources, the storing of flood waters, and, always, by economy of use the supply of waters should be conserved in the regions where the demand is large and increasing. But, however strictly these practices shall be followed, interstate water controversies in other sections of our country than the arid region and for other purposes than irrigation are not improbable. We should anticipate their adjustment by the principle of proportional rights, equitably applied in each case with regard to the facts.

NEW YORK, April-May, 1902.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN. In that very case to which the gentleman refers, Kansas v. Colorado, is it not true that the Supreme Court of the United States, in sustaining that demurrer, have said they have done so pro forma, in substance?

Mr. RAY of New York. My friend is all wrong——

Mr. MARTIN. And have they not committed themselves?

Mr. RAY of New York. My friend is all wrong.

Mr. MARTIN. I have not asked my question yet.

Mr. RAY of New York. They did not sustain the demurrer at all. They overruled it.

Mr. MARTIN. I was not through with my question when you presumed to answer it.

Mr. RAY of New York. They did not sustain the demurrer; they overruled it.

Mr. MARTIN. That is what I intended to say. In overruling the demurrer, did not the Supreme Court in substance declare that in so doing they did not commit themselves upon the question as to whether one State has the right to withhold the waters that otherwise in this arid country would pass through a State below, but that they considered that the questions involved are of such importance that there ought to be an answer in the case and the facts thoroughly investigated? Is not that the purport of the decision?

Mr. RAY of New York. They have stated in substance that they are not to be considered as having passed on the rights of the States or the law of appropriation of waters for irrigation purposes. Now, let me call your attention to another case.

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. RAY of New York. I desire to yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I was going to ask very much the same question, whether the Supreme Court had passed upon the merits?

Mr. RAY of New York. Not absolutely nor finally.

Mr. MARTIN. No, they did not at all.

[1] See supra, secs. 25, 26, 39, 40.

Mr. RAY of New York. They did not sustain the demurrer, but they overruled it, and they say that the question should be tried on the merits; but they plainly intimate that if the statements of the bill of complaint are true, then the State of Kansas has a cause of action.

Mr. MARTIN. The reason I interrupted the gentleman——

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, that is all right.

Mr. MARTIN. Was because the conclusion that you drew in your argument was that they had thereby virtually held——

Mr. RAY of New York. The conclusion I drew from it is this: That when the Supreme Court of the United States have a demurrer presented to them for consideration, if they find in the complaint no cause of action, they will sustain the demurrer. If they find a probable cause of action, they will overrule it.

But now let me invite your attention to another case that arose between citizens of the State of Connecticut and the city of New York. It is referred to in the remarks of Mr. Randolph quoted. There is a stream rising in the State of New York, two branches of it, which flow east, both passing from New York into the State of Connecticut. There were farmers in Connecticut all along the banks of that stream who have used that water ever since the State of Connecticut has been settled—that is, they and their predecessors in title.

The city of New York went to that stream in the State of New York—one branch—and built a dam some years ago, thus damming up that water and preventing the farmers of the State of Connecticut and the mill owners having the use of it. These farmers brought suit against the city of New York. They brought suit in the circuit court for an injunction to restrain the city of New York for thus holding back and damming and diverting that water, claiming that it had no right to prevent its flow into the State of Connecticut. The circuit and district courts held with these farmers in Connecticut. The case was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the district and circuit courts, but upon this ground, mind you: That the landholders in Connecticut by their own laches had permitted the city of New York to erect the dam, expend large sums of money, and take that water; and therefore they had assented to the diversion and could not at this late day ask for an injunction; but in the plainest kind of terms, through Justice Brewer, who, I think, wrote the opinion—and you will pardon me if I err in that—held in the plainest kind of terms, as I read it, that if they had moved in time, before a large amount of money had been expended—in other words, if they had not in effect assented—they could have restrained the construction of the dam and the diversion and appropriation of the water by the city of New York.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Did they hold that New York could, by paying damages, take the water?

Mr. RAY of New York. The opinion in the case says that the farm owners in Connecticut had practically consented and must now be content with damages.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That involves laches.

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And did the court hold that New York City could have exercised the right of eminent domain and have taken the water?

Mr. RAY of New York. They plainly intimated that she could not, and if you will look at Mr. Randolph's remarks you will find the case and the statement of the court. Of course you will understand the time is limited and I have taken more than I intended to, and I promised to yield time to others.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has only thirty minutes remaining.

Mr. RAY of New York. I have carefully read all the law applicable to this case. I say the bill is unjust and unfair to the farmers of the East. I say it is an unwise and improvident scheme. I say that it is a very dangerous power to put in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, and that there will be scandal. I say that the revenues, the moneys derived from the sale of public lands, would prove insufficient to carry out this scheme, and that within three years, certainly within five years, those interested would be appealing here to Congress to appropriate money out of the public Treasury with which to carry on and complete this scheme.

I say that the bill is incapable of execution because unconstitutional. I have pointed that out. I say again that you can not condemn these rights. I say again that we have no right under the Constitution to enter on this scheme, and I invite, in that connection, your attention to the points and cases that you will find in my minority report, and I will add to my remarks the views of the minority which contain quotations and a reference to all the cases.

Some one will say that the courts of the State of California have declared that irrigation is constitutional. So it is in the State, under the sovereignty of the State, and under her constitution, and why? She has the right to pass a law, as New York has, or any State, to clear up swamp lands for the public health, or wherever there is a mass of arid lands she may provide irrigation for them for the reasons stated in the case to which the report referred to calls special attention. The cases are different, the grounds of jurisdiction different.

Now, gentlemen who have presented this bill and spoken for it say that the President of the United States is for this bill. I do not know whether he is for this bill or not. If he is for it to-day, I do not believe he will be for it when he understands it. When the House bill was reported from the Committee on Arid Lands I read in the newspapers that the President was against the bill and that he had sent for several Senators and Representatives and declared in advance that he would not sign it. I take no stock in such reports as that. I love the President of the United States as a friend, as a patriotic citizen of the Empire State. I respect him and revere him as President of the United States, but I do not believe that the time has come when he sends for members of either House and tells them, as he sees a bill reported from a committee, "You must not pass that. If you do, I will veto it;" or You must pass that; you must do this or do that."

I do not believe it and you can not make me believe it. He may have his ideas. In his message he favored irrigation. Some one may have misled him into some sort of an indorsement of this scheme, but when it comes to the point where he understands it, and the consequences of writing it into a law, and the unconstitutional features of it, as he will, a different question will be presented.

I say to this House that I oppose this bill for the reason stated, and because I believe it to be unconstitutional. There is no gentleman in this House, or in the Senate, or in all this broad land, who would do more than I to support the Administration now dominant at the White House; that would do more to hold up the hands of the President than would I.

I am a Republican; I desire to carry out the principles declared and the promises of the Republicans made in convention, but no Republican national convention has ever indorsed this scheme. They have said they were in favor of irrigation. What they meant by that is what Republican conventions always mean, and that is, a wise law, well considered, one bringing the greatest good to the greatest number. We will do all that at the proper time, under proper conditions, and above all we will do it with reference to the rights and interests of all who dwell under the American flag, and without violating the Constitution of the United States. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I annex the report referred to.

[House Report No. 794, Part 2, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION OF ARID LANDS.

The undersigned members of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands can not agree with the majority of the committee, and are opposed to the bill in its present form and also to the general scheme proposed thereby as dangerous, unfair, impossible of execution, and unconstitutional.

THE SCHEME.

The general scheme of this bill (H. R. 9676) is to take the proceeds of the disposition of all public lands in the thirteen States and three Territories named in the bill (and there is little public land belonging to the United States elsewhere), excepting only the 5 per cent thereof set aside by law for educational and other purposes, and create therewith a special fund in the Treasury which is to be known as the "Reclamation fund," and such fund is to be used in the examination and survey for and the construction and maintenance of irrigation works for the storage, diversion, and development of waters for the reclamation of arid and semiarid lands in the States and Territories named, and for the payment of all other expenditures provided for in the act.

In case the receipts from the sale and disposal of public lands not included in this bill are insufficient to meet the requirements of existing law for the support of agricultural colleges in the States and Territories, such colleges are to be supported from moneys in the Treasury derived from other sources. Thereby education is subordinated to irrigation; intelligence to money.

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to make examinations and surveys for and to locate and construct irrigation works for the storage, diversion, and development of waters, including artesian wells: in his discretion to withdraw from public entry the lands required for the irrigation works contemplated, to let contracts for the construction of such work, and fix the charges for water rights, which are to be apportioned equitably.

When the Government has irrigated tracts of land, and the same have been sold with water rights, and a major portion of the lands irrigated has passed to private ownership, then the management and operation of such irrigation works shall pass to the owners of the lands irrigated thereby, to be maintained at their expense under such form of organization, etc., as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Interior; but the title to and the management and operation of the reservoirs and of the works necessary for their protection and operation are to remain in the Government.

The bill also provides that if in acquiring water rights, building reservoirs, etc., it becomes necessary to acquire any rights or property the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to acquire the same by purchase or condemnation and to pay therefor from the reclamation fund.

The bill also provides that nothing in the act shall be construed as affecting or interfering with the laws of any State or Territory relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation, but that State and Territorial laws shall govern and control in the appropriation, use, and distribution of the waters made available by the works constructed under the provisions of the act. It is not proposed to give a free home to anyone, or to extend any benefit to a citizen of the United States, or to all similarly situated.

THE SCHEME IS UNFAIR.

The bill does not provide what particular arid lands are to be irrigated, nor does it provide for the location of the irrigation works. The whole fund may be used in and for the benefit of any one State or any one Territory. All may be used in Nevada or in New Mexico or in Arizona, and the arid lands in the other States and Territories may go entirely unbenefited by the provisions of this act.

It has been stated that the proceeds of sales of public lands during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, amounted to the sum of about $4,000,000, but that the average receipts are between $1,000,000 and $2,000,000 per annum.

It is clear that the receipts from the sale of public lands will not justify the construction of adequate irrigation works, canals, etc., in all the States and Territories named.

It is also clear that if the proceeds of the sales of our public lands are to be devoted to irrigation, adequate provision should be made for all the States and Territories having arid lands susceptible of irrigation,

It is manifestly unjust and unwise to take the proceeds of public lands in one State and use them for irrigation in another State.

Nor is this criticism of the bill in any respect shaken by the insertion of the "plea in mitigation," section 9, and which reads as follows:

"SEC. 9. It is hereby declared to be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out the provisions of this act, so far as the same may be practicable and subject to the existence of feasible irrigation projects, to expend the major portion of the funds arising from the sale of public lands within each State and Territory hereinbefore named for the benefit of arid and semiarid lands within the limits of such State or Territory: Provided, That the Secretary may temporarily use such proportion of said funds for the benefit of arid or semiarid lands in any particular State or Territory hereinbefore named as he may deem advisable, but when so used the excess shall be restored to the fund as soon as practicable, to the end that ultimately, and in any event within each ten-year period after the passage of this act, the expenditures for the benefit of the said States and Territories shall be equalized according to the proportions and subject to the conditions as to practicability and feasibility aforesaid."

This section is a mere declaration of Congressional policy; it is not binding on the Secretary or intended to be, and was inserted to placate the opposition to the unfair provisions of the bill. It is declared to be the duty of the Secretary to expend a major portion of the proceeds of the sale of public lands in each of said States and Territories therein "so far as the same may be practicable and subject to the existence of feasible irrigation projects" therein. As the Secretary is made the creator and sole judge of the feasibility of all irrigation projects, it is not probable that he will create one in a locality not desirable to him however feasible it in fact might be or appear to others. But there is an exception to this declaration defining the duty of of the Secretary which nullifies all that goes before.

He may use the whole fund in one State or one Territory, and is to restore enough money to the other States or Territories within ten years (if he has it) to give these States or Territories the benefit of a trifle more than one-half the proceeds of its own public lands, but such declaration of duty is "subject to the conditions as to practicability and feasibility aforesaid." This provision comes out at the same hole that it entered, without accomplishing anything. In fact, it is meaningless, although it "sounds well." The sum and substance of the proposition is that the Secretary of the Interior is to expend the whole fund in his own discretion in such locality, State or Territory, as in his judgment presents practicable and feasible locations and projects. Of all this he is sole judge, jury, attorney, and executioner.

THE SCHEME IS UNWISE AND IMPROVIDENT.

It is asserted that if the proceeds of the public lands are wisely used in the construction and operation of suitable irrigation works, including reservoirs for the storage of water, artesian wells for pumping water out of the earth, and ditches and canals for conducting water from place to place, that millions of acres of unproductive land will be made fertile and opened up to settlement, thus providing homes for millions of people. It can not be doubted that millions of acres of land in the States and Territories named may be made productive by suitable irrigation works, provided an ample and continuous water supply can be obtained.

It is admitted that Nevada lacks the water necessary to make her arid and desert lands available, but it is proposed to have the General Government go into the State of California and appropriate the waters there, by purchase or condemnation, and conduct them into the State of Nevada for irrigation purposes. This part of the scheme, standing by itself, is so vast and expensive and involves so many complicated legal questions that the thoughtful man will hesitate long before seriously entertaining the proposition. California has arid lands of her own and use for all the waters within her State, both above and beneath the surface. It is not probable that this great State will ever consent or submit to have her waters, whether public or private waters, diverted to the State of Nevada. We deny that there is any power in the Government of the United States to condemn lands or water rights in one State for the use and improvement for sale of lands situate in another State, even when the lands in that other State belong to the General Government.

If the State of California should consent to part with her lands having a water supply, or should the private owners consent to part with theirs, an adequate compensation being paid, it is probable that the proceeds of the sale of our public lands would be exhausted in obtaining water rights at the very inception of the enterprise. It was suggested on the hearings had before the committee in the Fifty-sixth Congress that these arid lands should be turned over to the States, and that the States, respectively, should proceed to irrigate their own lands, constructing the works, artesian wells, reservoirs, etc., necessary for that purpose. The reply to this proposition was that States had undertaken but had abandoned these irrigation schemes because not profitable. If experience has proved that irrigation is not beneficial to the State, upon what theory will the General Government undertake a scheme so vast and expensive that the ordinary mind is staggered at its mere contemplation?

The proposition to furnish water by means of artesian wells constructed by the General Government is plausible, but does not meet our approval. Such wells are sometimes successful, but often unsuccessful. We do not believe that a sufficient supply of water for irrigation purposes on an extensive scale can be obtained by such means in any arid-land region. No one can, approximately even, correctly estimate the cost of such an enterprise. It is quite true that vast reservoirs may be constructed at or near the headwaters of large streams into which the water may be gathered and stored during the rainy season; that this water by means of ditches and canals may be carried long distances and made available at various points for irrigation purposes.

The cost of constructing, maintaining, and operating one of these reservoirs may be estimated; but any estimate will be far from the actual expense. If the Government commences the construction of such reservoirs at different points and the proceeds of sales of public lands are exhausted before they are completed and put in operation, a demand will immediately be made for an appropriation out of the public Treasury on the plea that the Government having gone into the business of irrigation and having expended millions for incompleted work such works must be preserved and completed in order to be of any value whatever. Such pleas are usually successful, but the result would be either that the Government must abandon its incomplete work or tax all the people for the benefit of a locality.

If we add millions of acres of productive land to our national possessions we shall surely diminish the value of the present farming lands throughout the Union, and we shall open new areas in the far West to compete in production with the farmers in the South, East, and middle West. The people in these sections will not consent, and ought not to consent, to pay from the public Treasury for the construction of such public works, which, even if successful, will work injury to their interests.

Our present agricultural lands are not so overcrowded or so unproductive that we need to enter on this scheme in order to feed or accommodate the people of this nation, even should the population double in the next fifty years. We are now producing and exporting millions of dollars' worth of farm products each year.

Nor should we open up these lands for the purpose of encouraging immigration. The time is at hand when immigration should be limited and discouraged rather than encouraged.

DANGEROUS POWERS GRANTED.

It is conceded that if this bill is enacted into law the Secretary of the Interior will have the absolute disposal of at least $6,000,000 now on hand, with about $3,000,000 added each year thereafter until the sale of irrigated lands commences, when the sum will be much larger.

No sane man desirous of promoting the growth and prosperity of our whole country and of making permanent our institutions of free government will consent to the placing of this immense sum of money and the power of appropriation or expenditure thereof at the disposal of any one man in times of peace. In the mad scramble for this money corruption would run riot. The Secretary of the Interior has not the time to see to the honest distribution and application of this money, and the whole matter would necessarily be left to the management of irresponsible subordinates. Civil service has been so extended that the Secretary of the Interior will be powerless to name the subordinates who will apply and expend the fund, and the Civil Service Commission is not responsible to anyone, and by the enactment of this bill Congress abrogates its power.

IT IS A RAILROAD PROJECT.

Nor is the proposition in this form inspired or approved by the people of the States and Territories in which these public lands are situate. The land-grant railroads are behind this scheme and the real beneficiaries. These roads run through these arid lands and semiarid regions, and they own vast tracts of these lands. The construction of these irrigation works and reservoirs at the public expense will inure to their benefit, for it will bring their lands into the market at twenty times their present value. In our judgment the Congress of the United States will be false to its trust if it sanctions a scheme the benefits of which are largely, at least, to be reaped by these railroad corporations.

These corporations inspire opposition to the plan of turning the public lands over to the States, leaving irrigation to State expense and State control and interstate agreement. The Secretary of the Interior is not only to expend all this money in the construction of these works without restraint, but he is to select the location and to determine their extent and character, control them when constructed, and fix the price and extent of water rights sold to settlers on what he may deem "equitable" principles.

The unwisdom of conferring all this power, of surrendering all this property, and of opening wide the doors to treasury "looting" is apparent.

IMPOSSIBLE OF EXECUTION.

In order to gain control of lands and water rights now in private ownership for the purpose of making fertile and more valuable for sale, not use, by the United States, the arid lands of the United States, it is proposed to condemn the desired lands and water rights when necessary. The theory is that un der the provisions of this bill the Government of the United States may enter a State and condemn the lands or the water rights and privileges of citizens of that State, and then divert such waters (both surface and underground waters) into vast reservoirs, into new channels, and into other States and Territories, where such waters did not before flow, for the purpose mentioned, on the theory that such diversion and application is a public use.

Even if such power of condemnation for the purpose mentioned exists in the General Government, which we most emphatically deny, it is readily seen that such a scheme involves not only the purchase or condemnation of lands and water rights, at the head of streams, but may necessitate the purchase or condemnation of every foot of soil and every water right for hundreds of miles from the source to the mouth of such streams excepting only those now owned by the Government. To absorb, confine, or divert the headwaters of a stream and use them for the irrigation of arid lands, thus depriving the owners below of the natural flow and necessary use of such waters, is a proposition so startling that we may well pause and inquire as to our constitutional power, as well as the cost of the water rights, which would run into the millions and might exhaust the fund, as is readily seen.

Every owner of a water right already appropriated, and to the full extent of the appropriation, is entitled thereto and is the owner thereof, and he can not be deprived of the same except by purchase or lawful condemnation proceedings for some public purpose on due compensation being made.

The sovereignty of the State extends to and over every foot of land within her borders, including the shores and soils under the navigable waters, and such State only can exercise the right of eminent domain over them.

The law on this subject is well stated by Pomeroy in his work on riparian rights, section 31:

"SEC. 31. Jurisdiction of State and United States distinguished.—It should be observed in this connection that the United States Government has no power whatever to prescribe for its grantees any general rules of law concerning the use of their lands, or of the lakes and streams to which they are adjacent, binding upon its grantees of portions of the public domain situated within a State, and becoming operative after they have acquired their titles from the Federal Government. The power to prescribe such rules, forming a part of the law concerning real property, belongs exclusively to the jurisdiction of the States. Over its public lands situate within a State the United States has only the rights of a proprietor, and not the legislative and governmental rights of a political sovereign. Even with respect to the navigable streams within a State the powers of the Federal Government are limited, and a fortiori that is so with respect to streams which are unnavigable.

"In the great case of Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan the authority of the United States over its public lands within a State was thus defined by the Supreme Court: 'When Alabama was admitted into the Union she succeeded to all the rights of sovereignty, jurisdiction, and eminent domain which Georgia possessed at the date of the cession, except so far as this right was diminished by the public lands remaining in the possession and under the control of the United States. Nothing remained in the United States, according to the terms of the agreement, but the public lands. And if an express stipulation had been inserted in the agreement granting the municipal right of sovereignty and eminent domain to the United States, such stipulation would have been void and inoperative, because the United States have no constitutional capacity to exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain within the limits of a State, except in cases in which it is expressly granted. * * * In the case of Martin v. Waddell the present Chief Justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "When the revolution took place the people of each State became themselves sovereign, and in that character hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters and the soils under them for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution." To Alabama, then, belong the navigable waters and soils under them in controversy in this case, subject to the rights surrendered by the Constitution to the United States.' Recognizing the power of the United States over such navigable streams for the purpose of regulating commerce, the court adds: 'The right of eminent domain over the shores and the soils under the navigable waters belongs exclusively to the States within their respective territorial jurisdictions, and they, and they only, have the constitutional power to exercise it.' * * *

"Summing up its conclusion, the court said: 'First, the shores of navigable waters and the soils under them were not granted by the Constitution to the United States, but were reserved to the States respectively; secondly, the new States have the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over this subject as the original States; thirdly, the right of the United States to the public lands and the power of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the sale and disposition thereof conferred no power to grant to the plaintiffs the land in controversy in this case.'"

Congress has no right of eminent domain in territory purchased of France and Spain. (Pollard v. Hagan, 3 How., U. S., 212.)

The right of eminent domain can not be exercised within a State by the United States for a purpose not incident to some power delegated to the General Government. (Kohl v. United States, 91 U. S., 367; Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kan. R., 135 U. S., 641; United States v. Fox, 94 U. S., 315; Van Brocklen v. Tennessee, 117 U. S., 151; Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S., 282; United States v. Gettysburg Elec. R., 160 U. S., 668.)

In the light of the adjudicated cases the provision in the bill authorizing the condemnation of lands is plainly unconstitutional.

The State has ample power to control all waters and lands within its boundaries by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, a power the General Government does not possess except in a limited degree and for purposes of which this is not one. Not possessing the power of eminent domain for the purposes of his bill, having no power over lands heretofore conveyed by it or by the States, how is the United States to obtain possession or control of streams rising outside its lands, passing through them, and then through lands of private individuals below? May it retain and store such waters and appropriate them to its uses without the consent of the owners below? Clearly not. There are places where private ownership alternates with public ownership. How shall the Government of the United States obtain the right to cut ditches, dig canals, etc., through these lands? Irrigation may be, and is, a public purpose so far as the State and its interests are concerned, but not as to the United States. The only power it has over these waters and lands underneath is under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. No one can claim that irrigation has any connection with interstate commerce.

Having under the Constitution full power over post-offices and post-roads, the United States may condemn lands for public buildings and grounds. So for military purposes may the power be exercised. But the relation of the General Government to the public lands is as mere owner, proprietor. It can not condemn the lands of private owners to promote schemes for increasing the value of public lands or promoting settlement thereon. The General Government will therefore, if this bill or any similar bill becomes a law, find itself hampered at every step, unable to carry any plan into successful operation, and will, as already stated, subject itself to claims, many of them just, involving millions of dollars, for the unlawful interference with water rights and privileges.

When a State is admitted into the Union, the sovereignty of the United States over every foot of soil in the State is at an end (unless expressly reserved), and that of the State becomes paramount. (Fort Leavenworth R. R. Co. v. Lowe, 114 U. S., pp. 526-527). Thereafter the United States, as to the public lands, has only the rights of an owner, subject to the sovereignty of the State. (Same case.)

NOT A PUBLIC USE.

The use proposed by this bill is not a public use unless Congress has the constitutional power to improve the Government lands for the purpose of making them more salable, bring a higher price in the market, and in so doing is carrying out a governmental purpose and executing a power conferred by the Constitution for the benefit of all the people.

That Congress may pass laws authorizing the acquiring of lands by condemnation proceedings for a public use of the United States is not denied.

Here the use contemplated is the acquiring of lands and water rights which are to be improved and then sold again to private individuals and used for private purposes, or used for storage purposes, the property (water) collected from such water rights and stored to be sold to private individuals and corporations and all for purposes of speculation or supposed gain, not to the public Treasury, but to the State, by increasing its population, productive power, and taxable property.

There is no gain to the public Treasury, for the proceeds of sales are to go into the construction and maintenance of the irrigation works; no benefit to the United States, unless it be in the promotion of the interests and growth of a State or of a few States to the possible and probable detriment of the many.

The water and water rights condemned are not to be kept and used by the General Government, but sold again for private use. Under the guise of condemning lands and water rights for a public use, the use of the public, we, in fact, propose to condemn them for purposes of sale and appropriation to private use. The works themselves, in the main, and the control and distribution of the water is expressly made subject to State laws, and hence to State control. Private use thereof is the ultimate object, the public use being temporary and for speculative purposes.

The right of eminent domain has never been exercised by the General Government for any such purpose. It has exercised it in the following instances:

Burt v. Merchants' Ins. Co. (106 Mass., 356), for a post-office; Kohl v. United States (91 U. S., 367), for United States courts; United States v. Jones (109 U. S., 513), to improve water communication between the Mississippi and Lake Michigan; United States v. Great Falls Manuf. Co. (112 U. S., 645), for supplying Washington with water; In re League Island (1 Brewster, 524), for a navy-yard; Gilmer v. Line Point (18 California, 229), for a fort; Reddall v. Bryan (14 Maryland, 444), for waterworks for Washington; Orr v. Quimby (54 N. H., 590); United States v. Chicago (7 How., 135), for military purposes. See also Constitution, Art. I, sec. 8; Fort Leavenworth v. Lowe (114 U. S., 525); U. S. v. Gettysburg Elec. Rwy. Co. (160 U. S., 668), for marking battlefield of civil war.

The power of the General Government to exercise such right for the purpose mentioned in this act is denied by authors of recognized ability.

There is a difference between the powers of the Federal Government and the powers of a State government in acquiring land within that State by the exercise of the right of eminent domain. This difference is thus expressed in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, sixth edition, page 645:

"As under the peculiar American system the protection and regulation of private rights, privileges, and immunities in general belong to the State government, and those governments are expected to make provision for the conveniences and necessities which are usually provided for their citizens through the exercise of the right of eminent domain, the right itself, it would seem, must pertain to those governments also, rather than to the Government of the nation; and such has been the conclusion of the authorities.

"In the new Territories, however, where the Government of the United States exercises sovereign authority, it possesses, as incident thereto, the right of eminent domain, which it may exercise directly or through the Territorial government; but this right passes from the nation to the newly formed State whenever the latter is admitted into the Union. So far, however, as the General Government may deem it important to appropriate lands or other property for its own purposes, and to enable it to perform its functions—as must sometimes be necessary in the case of forts, light-houses, military posts or roads, and other conveniences and necessities of the Government—the General Government may still exercise the authority as well within the States and within the Territory under its exclusive jurisdiction, and its right to do so may be supported by the same reasons which support the right in any case; that is to say, the absolute necessity that the means in the Government for performing its functions and perpetuating its existence should not be liable to be controlled or defeated by the want of consent of private parties, or of any other authority."

It may be said that if such lands are made productive, hence made more beautiful, the public taste will be gratified, the people generally made more proud of their country, and that therefore the general welfare will be promoted. Says Cooley (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 4th ed., p. 664):

"It may be for the public benefit that all the wild lands of the State be improved and cultivated, all the lowlands drained, all the unsightly places beautified, all dilapidated buildings replaced by new, because all these things tend to give an aspect of beauty, thrift, and comfort to the country, and thereby to invite settlement, increase the value of lands, and gratify the public taste; but the common law has never sanctioned an appropriation of property based upon these considerations alone, and some further element must therefore be involved before the appropriation can be regarded as sanctioned by our constitutions.

"The reason of the case and the settled practice of free governments must be our guides in determining what is or is not to be regarded a public use, and that only can be considered such where the government is supplying its own needs or is furnishing facilities for its citizens in regard to those matters of public necessity, convenience, or welfare which, on account of their peculiar character and the difficulty—perhaps impossibility—of making provision for them otherwise, it is alike proper, useful, and needful for the Government to provide."

In Wilson v. The Blackbird Creek Marsh Company (2 Peters (U. S.), 245, 250, and 251), Marshall, C. J., says:

"The act of assembly by which the plaintiffs were authorized to construct their dam shows plainly that this is one of those many creeks passing through a deep, level marsh adjoining the Delaware, up which the tide flows for some distance. The value of the property on its banks must be enhanced by excluding the water from the marsh, and the health of the inhabitants probably improved. Measures calculated to produce these objects, provided they do not come into collision with the powers of the General Government, are undoubtedly within those which are reserved to the States."

It follows that the power of condemnation for such a purpose rests solely in the State.

The right of eminent domain can not lawfully be exercised unless the property taken is to remain in the possession, occupation, and enjoyment of the public or of the Government for the public use. Says Cooley (Const. Lim., p. 530, 531, 3d ed.):

"Nor could it be of importance that the public would receive incidental benefits, such as usually spring from the improvement of lands or the establishment of prosperous private enterprises. The public use implies a possession, occupation, and enjoyment of the land by the public at large, or by public agencies; and a due protection to the rights of private property will preclude the Government from seizing it in the hands of the owner and turning it over to another on vague grounds of public benefit to spring from the more profitable use to which the latter may devote it."

The proposition is reduced to this, that the United States being the owner of large tracts of arid lands, situate within certain States over which it has no rights of sovereignty, but only those of private ownership, and having the constitutional right to "dispose" of them, and being desirous of disposing of them at a profit, and being also desirous of increasing the population and prosperity of the said States, and providing homes (not free, but for pay) for and intending to sell such lands to private owners for agricultural purposes, asserts the right to enter such States and condemn the lands and water rights owned by the individual citizens of such States for the purpose of constructing reservoirs, canals, ditches, etc., in which to gather and store, and through which to convey water to its arid lands wherever situated for the purpose of irrigating them and making them more productive and consequently more salable.

In short, an individual owner (and that is the interest of the United States), for his own indirect benefit and possible profit, proposes to condemn the lands of others for his own use on the plea that, as the use to which he proposes to put the condemned lands will ultimately benefit large numbers of people in certain States, including his own and those attracted thither, such use is a public use—that is, a use for the benefit of all the people of the Union—and that the lands are, in fact, condemned for a public purpose. On such a plea the United States may pass laws to condemn the lands of one citizen to enlarge the dooryard of another, if by so doing it improves the neighborhood and attracts population and increases values.

On such a plea the United States may engage in buying and selling lands situate within a State for mere profit, and then condemn adjacent property on the grounds stated. The United States is not a dealer in real estate and has not the constitutional power to become such; it is not a real estate improvement society and has not the constitutional power to become such. The objects and purposes mentioned are not governmental objects or purposes. Nor is the principle of public use involved because the United States, the owner of such lands, is also the lawmaking body.

The Government as owner must be regarded as an individual. As well might the legislature of a State pass laws to condemn the lands of others for the improvement of the individual properties of its members as for the United States to pass laws to condemn the lands of others for the improvement merely of its own, when such improvement is for purposes of sale, not use by or for all the people.

Nor should we lose sight of the fact that if the United States may enter a State and condemn and take water rights, both above and beneath the surface (beneath by means of artesian wells), and carry such waters outside the State, it may in so doing drain and render arid and unproductive the remaining lands in the State, and the owners thereof and the State will be powerless to prevent.

For if the purpose be a public use of the United States, and it has the right of condemnation for such a purpose, then its will in such regard is superior to the power of the State, for its sovereignty whenever and wherever it exists is "supreme." (Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. S., 257; Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat., 363; In re Neagle, 135 U. S., 61-62; Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S., 571-594.)

"The United States is a Government with authority extending over the whole territory of the Union, acting upon the States and the people of the States. While it is limited in the number of its powers, so far as its sovereignty extends it is supreme. No State government can exclude it from the exercise of any authority conferred upon it by the Constitution * * * or withhold from it for a moment the cognizance of any subject which that instrument has committed to it."

The danger and unwisdom of conferring such power, even if it can lawfully be done, is apparent.

The irrigation and improvement of lands within a State (including the public lands of the United States) is a matter peculiarly within the jurisdiction and province of such State in the exercise of its sovereign powers, and to its will must the United States bow so far as its public lands situate therein are concerned when not held for governmental purposes, such as military reservations, post-office sites, etc. As to these it is a sovereign, but as to its public lands it is a mere owner or proprietor, as we have seen. (Fort Leavenworth R. R. Co. v. Lowe, 114 U. S., 526-527; Pomeroy Riparian Rights, sec. 31.)

THE BILL IS UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Thus far we have presented only the unconstitutionality of those provi sions in the bill providing for the condemnation of lands and water rights situate within a State.

The bill is also unconstitutional because the Congress of the United States has no power to provide for the irrigation improvement of its public lands situate within a State—probably not those situate in a Territory.

As the provisions of the bill providing for irrigation within a State are not separable from those providing for irrigation within a Territory (if that may constitutionally be done), but the whole subject is embraced in general language, and the good (if any) is only separable from the bad by construction, not by striking out words, the whole bill is unconstitutional. (United States v. Harris, 106 U. S., 629, 637, 642; United States v. Reese, 92 U. S., 214; Baldwin v. Franks, 120 U. S., 685-686.)

"To give effect to the rule that when part of the statute is constitutional and part is unconstitutional, that which is constitutional will, if possible, be enforced, and that which is unconstitutional will be rejected, the two parts must be capable of separation, so that each can be read by itself. Limitation by construction is not separation."

The bill is unconstitutional because the improvement of public lands for sale is not a governmental purpose or an object for which the Government was established or the nation founded, nor is it incidental thereto. It is not necessary to the preservation of the Government or to the discharge of governmental functions.

Second. The Constitution confers no such power, expressly or by implication.

Third. The Constitution in express terms designedly limits the powers of Congress over our public lands to the disposition thereof and the making of needful rules and regulations respecting same.

Will anyone contend that a law of Congress providing for the survey and fencing of the public domain within a State (and where the sovereign power of the State prevails) into farms and the planting of trees and the erection of farm buildings, etc., thereon, and the payment for such improvements out of the public treasury (or from the proceeds of sales thereof) and the sale of such farms to individuals for purposes of agriculture would be constitutional? Is a nation formed or a government of its people provided for any such purpose?

The Constitution neither refers to nor expressly mentions any such power. That power exists if the constitutional power to pass this bill exists.

When the Constitution was framed and adopted the United States owned vast tracts of public lands called "territory" (sec. 3, Art. IV). As owner it might improve, or use, or rent, or sell. It could do either or all.

But in dealing with the subject the fathers of the Republic, in their wisdom, foresaw what might be attempted, to wit, perpetual Government ownership of lands and a system of governmental landlordism—feudalism—the General Government engaged in improving and renting its lands for agricultural purposes and thus holding the citizens within Government control and subjection without interest in the soil. A feudal tenure to lands without ownership is thus defined by Blackstone:

"The fundamental maxim of all feudal tenure is this: That all lands were originally granted out by the sovereign and are therefore holden of the crown."

Opposed to such a system and designing to prevent its establishment, our fathers wrote into the fundamental law of the land a provision limiting and restricting the powers of the General Government and of Congress over its own public lands, viz (section 3, Article IV, Constitution):

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular State."

The ordinary and legal powers of the Government as an owner were expressly limited and restricted, so far as Congress is concerned, to the "power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." These words were carefully selected and designedly, deliberately, and wisely used for a purpose which ought to be respected by the Congress of the United States.

The power to dispose of lands does not include as incident thereto the power to improve or even repair, and it has been universally so held. A power of attorney to sell and convey lands does not include the power to repair or to improve. We may care for them, preserve them, survey and plot them, sell off the timber, and lease the mining lands in the Territories, for this is but a disposition of the ores and metals therein, and if in so doing we incidentally improve such lands we do not violate the Constitution.

But when we enact a law the sole purpose of which is to improve and make productive arid and unproductive lands for the purpose of sale, we have departed from our constitutional right and are exercising a power impliedly denied to Congress. That power which is not expressed or necessarily implied is as positively denied to Congress as though expressly prohibited. Such powers are reserved to the States or retained by the people.

See tenth amendment to the Constitution.

Martin v. Hunter's Lessee (1 Wheat., 326).

Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 187).

And when a power is conferred by language defining it and bounding it, that is excluded which is not in terms included.

There is no doubt in our minds that the Constitution by plain implication denies to Congress the power to provide for the general improvement of the public lands intended for sale, not use, by the Government with the object of making them more productive and consequently more marketable.

Control over interstate commerce is expressly given to Congress by the Constitution, but without any such warrant the Congress of the United States now proposes (if it enacts this bill into law) to assume control of all interstate waters above and beneath the surface, and, if not interstate in their natural flow, to make them so, so far as necessary, for the purpose of irrigating its arid lands and so making them marketable.

DANGERS OF SUCH POWER.

Under this bill the Secretary of the Interior (if provided with money enough) may divert the headwaters of the Missouri River into the State of Utah or Idaho or of Nevada. If such power of diversion for the purpose of irrigating arid lands exists, the navigability of public rivers may be seriously impaired, if not destroyed.

The supposed right and power of the Federal Government to irrigate public lands for sale will come in direct conflict with the power expressly granted by the Constitution to control and maintain interstate commerce, and which power and interest shall prevail in controlling the water rights of the Far West will depend upon a muster of forces in the Congress of the United States. If power to appropriate and control those waters for both purposes really exists, it is self-evident that no Congressional action should be taken which will or may impair the navigability of streams upon the lower waters of which great towns have sprung up, relying for their prosperity on the natural and unobstructed flow of the streams themselves and noninterference with the watersheds, springs, and small streams which feed these great waterways.

The power of the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this bill is not limited to the collection and retention of surplus waters. He may collect and retain the headwaters of rivers at all seasons without restraint and, while artificially watering lands now arid and unproductive, destroy thousands of farms in now fertile regions or deprive their owners in the summer season or the dry season of their water supply for farm animals and even ordinary household uses. To confer such a power on the Secretary of the Interior, if we can, is unwise and will involve the Government in endless expense and claims for damage and destroy more property by far than the value of all the irrigated lands.

THE WELFARE CLAUSE.

But it is contended that section 8 of Article I of the Constitution confers the necessary power.

"The Congress shall have power * * * to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

It is contended that any act or expenditure that adds to the productiveness and consequently to the value and salability of the public lands within a State conduces to the general welfare, and that consequently the irrigation of our arid lands at the public expense is authorized by the Constitution.

Just how the expenditure of millions of dollars of the public funds, not a penny of which is to be returned to the Treasury of the United States for the use or benefit of the people, for the improvement of the public lands will promote the general welfare is not exactly apparent. Concede for the sake of the argument that the lands will be more valuable, more desirable, more salable, and will be more speedily settled when irrigated, still it is a conceded fact that under the provisions of the bill not a penny of pecuniary profit will accrue to the people of the United States. In a pecuniary sense there is a dead loss to the people of a sum variously estimated at from one to ten billions of dollars. It may be more, but can not be less.

It is contended that eventually the money will come back to the Government; that at some time the arid lands will all be irrigated, and that the expense of construction will cease, but that the income from sales of water rights, or of rights to use water, will go on perpetually, and that by and by a fund will accumulate and be at the disposition of Congress for the benefit of all the people. This contention is overthrown by the provision of the bill which requires all proceeds of water and water rights to be paid into the reclamation fund and used for "maintenance" of the works as well as construction. All must concede that the maintenance will be as costly, nearly, as the original construction and that constant repairs will be necessary as long as irrigation is maintained. The income from use (even could the United States control such income) would fall far short of maintaining such a vast system of reservoirs and canals and ditches.

We can discover no way by which the "general welfare" of the United States is to be conserved under the operation of the provisions of this bill in a pecuniary sense. The mere addition of more productive soil, more production, more population, more consumption, more sources of taxation, etc., in certain localities and within States to that we now have and enjoy will hardly be claimed to promote the general welfare or to constitute an object for which we may tax the whole people of the nation. It may be said that if such lands are made productive, hence made more beautiful, the public taste will be gratified, the people generally made more proud of their country, and that therefore the general welfare will be promoted. Says Cooley (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 4th ed., p. 664):

"It may be for the public benefit that all the wild lands of the State be improved and cultivated, all the lowlands drained, all the unsightly places beautified, all dilapidated buildings replaced by new, because all these things tend to give an aspect of beauty, thrift, and comfort to the country, and thereby to invite settlement, increase the value of lands, and gratify the public taste; but the common law has never sanctioned an appropriation of property based upon these considerations alone, and some further element must therefore be involved before the appropriation can be regarded as sanctioned by our constitutions. The reason of the case and the settled practice of free governments must be our guides in determining what is or is not to be regarded a public use, and that only can be considered such where the Government is supplying its own needs, or is furnishing facilities for its citizens in regard to those matters of public necessity, convenience, or welfare which, on account of their peculiar character and the difficulty—perhaps impossibility—of making provision for them otherwise, it is alike proper, useful, and needful for the Government to provide."

In Wilson v. The Blackbird Creek Marsh Company (2 Peters (U. S.), 245, 250, and 251) Marshall, C. J., says:

"The act of assembly by which the plaintiffs were authorized to construct their dam shows plainly that this is one of those many creeks passing through a deep level marsh adjoining the Delaware, up which the tide flows for some distance. The value of the property on its banks must be enhanced by excluding the water from the marsh, and the health of the inhabitants probably improved. Measures calculated to produce these objects, provided they do not come into collision with the powers of the General Government, are undoubtedly within those which are reserved to the States."

It would seem clear from this that the power to improve lands and add to their value and beauty must be within those reserved to the States generally as to all lands within the State and not one conferred upon or surrendered to the General Government, even as to lands owned by the General Government, for the powers of Congress over same are limited, as we have seen, by the Constitution.

In Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley (164 U. S., 112) it was held that under the constitution and laws of California (which must control) irrigation of the arid lands of California within that State authorized thereby is a public purpose. (See pp. 160, etc.) But this falls far short of intimating that the Government of the United States may constitutionally appropriate money to construct works to irrigate its arid lands situated within a State, which lands are to be irrigated for sale, not use, by the Government.

The State being the sovereign and having the inherent power to condemn lands for a public use, and the purpose being to improve the lands of all for retention and use by the people, the common and perpetual good of the State and all its people, it was properly held the law of California was valid and irrigation a public use for which property might be condemned.

CONFLICTING PROVISIONS.

Just how the provisions of this bill, if enacted into law, are to be carried into effect is a problem no member of this House can solve and one that no court can ever elucidate.

By section 6 it is provided that when the payments for a major portion of the lands irrigated from the waters of "any of the works" constructed are made, "then the management and operation of such irrigation works shall pass to the owners of the lands irrigated thereby" under "such form of organization as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Interior." "Provided, That the title to and the management and operation of the reservoirs and the works necessary for their protection and operation shall remain in the Government."

The water will be in the reservoirs which can not operate otherwise than through the ditches, canals, etc., connected therewith, and hence all the irrigation works, canals, ditches, etc., will be necessary for their "operation."

Thus far the management and operation of these works are given to only two different parties: First, to the owners of the land who first purchase irrigated lands, giving those who purchase later no will in the matter at all; and second, to the Government of the United States (and which Government for the purposes of this bill is reduced to the Secretary of the Interior). Whose will is to control in case of disagreement is not stated.

But section 8 now comes in and still further complicates the matter. That section says:

"SEC. 8. That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State or Territory relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation, but State and Territorial laws shall govern and control in the appropriation, use, and distribution of the waters rendered available by the works constructed under the provisions of this act: Provided, That the right to the use of water acquired under the provisions of this act shall be appurtenant to the land irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right."

It is conceded on all hands that it will be utterly impracticable and usually impossible to have the reservoirs containing the water located in the same State with the land to be irrigated and some considerable portion of the irrigation works connected with and fed from such reservoirs. It is conceded that reservoirs, or at least the water supply, for irrigation in Nevada must be located in California. California by her laws will control the "appropriation" of the water, for it is in that State, and will also determine when and in what quantity the reservoirs shall discharge such water, but Nevada may control the "distribution" when such waters as California sees fit to part with arrive in that State, and also the "use" thereof.

Then again, says the bill, the right to the use of water in reservoirs owned (both water and reservoirs) by the United States, but the appropriation of which is governed by the laws of California and the distribution and use of which is governed by the laws of Nevada, "shall be appurtenant to the land irrigated" (which land is owned and controlled by citizens of the State of Nevada), and "beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right." These questions of the right to the use and of beneficial use of these stored waters must be determined by the laws of the United States, and in case of dispute by the courts of the United States, for Federal laws grant them, while by the first part of the section the control, appropriation, use, and distribution of water used in irrigation is to be governed by Territorial or State laws administered in the State or Territorial courts, as the case may be. The entryman in Nevada must look to the United States for his right to water, to California for his water, and to Nevada for his right to use and distribute it.

As to lands within a State, Congress can pass no valid law making these water rights appurtenant to the land, for this is legislation as to real estate (relating to the law of real property) situate within a State and subject to its sovereignty and any laws it sees fit to pass. (See Pomeroy on Riparian Rights, sec. 31, already quoted.) The owner of real estate, in selling it, can confer no benefits nor impose any restrictions running with and connected with the enjoyment of such land that are not subject to the laws of the State in which the land is situated, the State being sovereign.

Again, to be clear, the United States as to its public lands in a State is only an owner with the rights of private ownership, the same as those of an individual. When territory is admitted into the Union as a State, the sovereignty of the United States is surrendered to the new State and the sovereignty of the State attaches and becomes paramount as to every foot of soil, unless expressly reserved to the General Government, and subject to the right of that Government to condemn for a public use of the United States necessary to the performance of its governmental functions or to its preservation.

Hence the provision in this bill that such water rights shall be appurtenant to the land and that beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right is unquestionably unconstitutional.

The unwisdom of the Federal Government in undertaking this irrigation scheme is thus plainly demonstrated. If, in the future, the welfare of the nation demands such works and the States find themselves unable to irrigate the lands within their respective jurisdictions, the necessary power to enter States and condemn water rights and lands and bring them all under Federal control can be given by the adoption of a constitutional amendment. But present conditions are not imperative, and there is no constitutional power to enact this bill or enforce its provisions.

The expenditure of millions of dollars, the possible necessity for the expenditure of other millions, for the direct purpose of making public lands productive and marketable, and the indirect purpose of adding to the wealth and prosperity of a few of the forty-five States, is a project calling for most serious thought and careful consideration. This we have given the subject, with the result stated, and we must therefore oppose the bill reported from the committee.

GEO. W. RAY.

I concur in the opinion that there is a total want of authority in Congress to pass the bill in question, or, in fact, any bill providing for national irrigation. But if Congress had the power, and it was generally conceded that the subject of national irrigation was one worthy of the attention of Congress, it would, in my judgment, be impossible to enter upon the proposed plan, because it embraces more than one State and the Federal Government would have to enter each State upon the same terms as a private individual or corporation, entirely divested of its sovereignty, and would have no power to purchase or condemn property needed for the enterprise held by persons other than the Federal Government; would be subject to the varying laws of the differeet States; would have no right to interfere with water courses to the detriment of private ownership or the rights of the States in the same.

My judgment is not based on the narrow doctrine of the rights of the States as against the Federal Government, but upon the broad proposition that the proposed plan is entirely outside of the powers of Congress and impossible of execution.

JOHN J. JENKINS.

[Mr. TONGUE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. TIRRELL. Mr. Chairman, allusion has been made, I think by every speaker who has preceded me, to the position of the dominant political parties of this country upon the measure now before the House. I know that some upon this floor have during this session of Congress intimated that the planks of party platforms should be followed in the breach as well as in the observance, but I am one of those who believe that the planks of the dominant political parties of our country are the crystallization of the opinions of the country upon the industrial and commercial conditions in which the people are interested; that they are not the ebullitions of embryotic statesmen or the profound deductions of some politician at the midnight hour. They are not to be disregarded. When we accepted our nominations, we accepted them agreeing to stand by them. We argued them before the people. We were elected upon the strength of them, and we pledged our constituents that we would, if possible, see enacted into law the principles which they represent.

Therefore, I say that, unless this measure, which is in accordance with the platforms of the two great political parties of the country, is either extravagant, ineffective, illegal, or unconstitutional, we are in duty bound to see to it that it is enacted into law. Therefore, before I proceed to speak upon the merits of this bill I desire to call the attention of the House to the objections which have been raised and which have more or less been referred to by those who have preceded me and which are embodied in the elaborate report of the minority of this committee. The chief of these objections is that, while the Government owns its public lands, it can only dispose of them so that all the proceeds of the sale go to the Treasury of the United States and can only be expended for general governmental purposes.

The gentleman from New York, if I understood his position distinctly, laid down the doctrine that so limited was the sovereignty of this country over its own property that it could not put a fence around its own public lands; that it could not remove a bowlder from them; that it could not cut down a tree upon them; that it could not make a road through them; that it could do nothing with them; that they must lie a Desert of Sahara for all time to come, because under the present condition of things it is absolutely impossible that they can be utilized for any general purpose by the people of the country.

Now, to see whether that is the case, I ask you to examine the report of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and see if in that report there is one decision which substantiates the position he takes. There is no law to back it up. He makes the assertion and then he passes on to consider a different principle of law, to which I shall allude in a moment. Whereas, if the gentleman had taken the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for last Tuesday he would have seen in that RECORD an opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, to which I will now briefly advert, which contradicts every principle he laid down here in regard not only to the ownership of our public lands, but to their disposition. This opinion is backed up by authorities which are cited, and this opinion and these authorities go to show that the United States in its sovereign capacity has as absolute control over its public lands as any ordinary property owner under the common law. Let me call your attention to one or two sentences from that opinion as illustrating the position which I am now taking. All these statements are backed up by references to decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

> The term "territory" as here used is merely descriptive of the kind of property and is equivalent to the word "lands."

I call your attention, gentlemen, to this principle of law laid down by the Attorney-General:

> The Government has, with respect to its own lands, the right of an ordinary proprietor to maintain its possession and to prosecute trespassers. It may deal with such lands precisely as any private individual may deal with his farming property.

If a private individual can not improve and irrigate his own farm, then all ideas in regard to the ownership of property are futile. Later the opinion goes on to say:

> This is so manifestly the correct doctrine that the whole question authorizes the proposition that as to the public lands within a State the Government has all the rights of an individual proprietor supplemented with the power to make and enforce its own laws for the assertion of those rights and for the disposal and full and complete management, control, and protection of its lands.

I can not on this point cite any more cases in substantiation of this principle, because my time is exceedingly limited. Therefore, I pass on to the second objection, which the minority report makes, drawn by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY]. The gentleman devotes four pages of his report to the citation of what he claims to be the law bearing upon this point, that this bill ought not to pass because the United States has not the power of condemnation of private property, and that private property must be condemned for the successful establishment and carrying out of these irrigation works.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. TIRRELL. No; my time is so limited that I can not do it. I have only twenty minutes and I have a great deal to say. I want to say to the gentleman that if he had taken the pains to look up the facts as to whether any private lands at all would have to be taken for these projects that he has taken to look up cases which do not have any bearing upon the question, he would have ascertained, as I have ascertained—from the Geological Survey—that there are over 400 sites as to which the expense has been determined, the amount of water which can be used, and what will have to be done to carry the water to the arid lands. Four hundred of those sites have now been thoroughly examined and the expense ascertained, and I am informed by those in authority, by the Geological Survey, that not one of these sites will require the condemnation of any private land for years to come, and only a few under any circumstances.

And even where private lands would have to be condemned they inform me that by a slight change and some additional expense the location can be made different and the condemnation of any private lands whatever avoided.

But does not the gentleman know, after the examination of the authorities, that it is not necessary that the United States should condemn private property in order to carry out the completion of its works? For three-quarters of a century the lands acquired by the United States were acquired by the condemnation of the States themselves and then turned over by the States to the Federal Government. The site upon which the Boston post-office has been constructed within thirty years is upon lands which were condemned by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and then conveyed to the Federal Government. Does anyone believe, if any of this land should have to be condemned, that the State which would receive by its condemnation unbounded wealth in the future in the development of their arid lands into arable lands would hesitate for one moment to cooperate with the United States and condemn all that may be necessary?

Does the gentleman believe that if there was a strip of private property necessary to the completion of this work that it would not at once, without money and without price, be conveyed? Any combination of private owners would offer their land to the Government without any compensation whatever, because these lands as they are now held are absolutely worthless, while if the irrigation was completed it would make the contiguous lands of the property owners valuable in the future.

Let me quote from some of the authorities given in this minority report, that you may see, from the very cases selected to prove their proposition, they are not sustained:

> Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kansas Railroad Company (135 U. S., 656): Whatever may be the necessities or conclusions of theoretical law as to eminent domain or anything else, it must be received as a postulate of the Constitution that the Government is invested with full and complete power to execute and carry out its purposes. * * * All lands are held subject to the authority of the General Government to take them for such objects as are germane to the execution of the powers granted to it.
>
> United States v. Gettysburg (160 U. S., 668): Any act of Congress which plainly and directly tends to enhance the respect and love of its citizens for the institutions of his country, and to quicken and strengthen his motives to defend, and which is germane to and intimately connected with and approximate to the exercise of some one or all of the powers granted by Congress, must be valid and the proposed use come within such description. * * * The power to condemn for this purpose need not be plainly and unmistakably deduced from any one of the particularly granted powers; any number of these powers may be grouped together, and an inference from them all may be drawn that the power claimed has been conferred.
> Luxton v. River Bridge Company (U. S., 153): Whenever it becomes necessary for the accomplishment of any object within the authority of Congress to exercise the right of eminent domain and take private lands, making just compensation to the owners, Congress may do this with or without a concurrent act of the State in which the land lies.
>
> Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 522: If the public interest can in any way be promoted by the taking of private property, it must rest in the wisdom of the legislatures whether the benefit to the public will be of sufficient importance to render it expedient for them to exercise the right of eminent domain.
> United States v. Railroad Bridge Company (6 McLain, 517) and Illinois Central Railroad Company (20 Law Reporter, 630): Held that the United States, acting through Congress, has the right of eminent domain for all purposes incidental to the exercise of the power conferred by the Constitution and such as exist by necessary implication.

There is a long array of authorities absolutely asserting that the Federal Government has the right to condemn lands wherever it may be necessary for the carrying out of any of the powers specified in the Constitution or incidental thereto, whether it be for the common defense or for the general welfare.

Without citing further from this long list of authorities, all upon one side of this question, I claim that if the gentleman rests his case upon the elaborate discussion which he has made in his report upon the condemnation of private lands for the public use, then he is resting his case upon an absolutely false ground. The last ground argued by the minority is that this use of water is not a public use, and the bill is therefore unconstitutional. This has been well answered by the gentleman from Oregon, who has raised the question of public use. If the gentleman from New York had examined the authorities thoroughly, as he ought to have done, he would have found an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, asserting that the use of water is a public use, and no State west of the Mississippi has ever decided otherwise.

And I desire to quote here what Judge Hare says, one of the greatest commentators of the Constitution. He calls attention to a very interesting feature of this whole discussion, namely, that, owing to the principles of our constitutional law, it is almost impossible for the courts of the United States to decide this question, since it is primarily a question for the legislature and not for the courts. He speaks of Monroe's recantation, contained in the message above referred to, and says that it was, like that of Madison, of the earlier date—

a virtual adoption of the Hamiltonian theory, that the power of the Congress over the Treasury is in effect absolute as to the appropriation of money for any object which in their judgment will conduce to the defense of the country or promote its welfare. Such, in fact, has been the practice since the Government went into operation, and the right can scarcely be questioned in the face of a usage which will soon extend through an entire century.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. TIRRELL. I do not know that I can. I would state to the gentleman from Illinois I have only twenty minutes.

Mr. MANN. It may be in the line that you are stating. If 400 sites can be acquired without condemnation of private land, why not strike that feature out of the bill?

Mr. TIRRELL. I think the bill would be just as strong, if my opinion is correct, if that were stricken out as if it were in, from the information I have received from the Geological Survey.

Mr. MANN. Why not strike it out, then?

Mr. TIRRELL. Because it may be needed in time to come in a few cases, and it does not do any harm. There is ample authority of law and of fact to keep it there.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. TIRRELL. I must decline to yield, for I have only twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RAY of New York. I want to know if you intend——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RAY of New York. I am appealing to the gentleman to see whether he will yield to me.

Mr. TIRRELL. I do not propose to yield, because my time is so limited.

Mr. RAY of New York. You do not mean to misrepresent me? You do not mean to state that I said the Government had no power to condemn lands for any purpose?

Mr. TIRRELL. We will have to stand upon what the gentleman says, as reported in the RECORD, and I stand by what I understood him to say.

Mr. RAY of New York. Oh, well, I will answer the gentleman later, when he insists on misrepresenting me and does it purposely.

Mr. TIRRELL. I do not wish to be so foolish before this highly intelligent body of gentlemen here as to willfully make a misstatement.

Mr. RAY of New York. Why do you not answer it?

Mr. TIRRELL. I have not the time to do so. If water is a public use; if the Federal Government can make all necessary rules for the regulation and management of its own property; if it can provide for the common defense and general welfare, all of which is asserted in the Constitution, there is little left to argue on this ground. I advise the opposition to go back to the fundamental sources from which they drew their legal inspiration and turn to Kent's Commentaries, volume 2, page 532, and read the following:

The reason of the case and the settled practice of every government must be our guides in determining what is and what is not to be regarded as a public use, and that only can be considered such where the government is supplying its own needs or is furnishing facilities for its citizens in regard to those matters of public necessity, commerce, or welfare which, on account of their peculiar character and the difficulty, perhaps impossibility, of making provision for them otherwise, it is proper, useful, and needful for the government to provide.

BENEFITS RATHER THAN INJURES THE NEW ENGLAND FARMER.

I desire to call attention to another section of this bill, inasmuch as I believe I am the only Eastern member on the Committee on Irrigation, certainly the only one from the northeastern section of the country with the exception of the gentleman from New York.

In the early part of this session the gentleman from Pennsylvania advanced an argument against this bill to which I wish to advert. While I admire his versatility, ability, and genial qualities, I can not agree with his economic statements relative to this subject. They are not substantiated by the results of the examination of the agricultural data of either Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, or the Eastern States generally, to which he referred. He realizes, as all realize, that when the arid lands of this country are irrigated they will rival in richness and productiveness the most favored lands of ancient Egypt. Indeed he asserts that 1 acre will produce as much as 6 acres of average land in the States of the middle West.

From this he draws the gloomy conclusion that previous development of the great West has forced down the valuation of farm lands in the Eastern States 50 per cent, with a corresponding decline in farm products. He asserts that for thirty-five years the farmers have seen a decline in value year by year of the old homestead. That now, just as prosperity begins to dawn upon the Eastern farmer, this irrigated-land tyranny threatens to strike him down. Competition must be suppressed. The productive acreage of the country must be curtailed. No more farms must be given by the Government to the American farmer. Those arid plains must remain undeveloped. The Eastern farmer must be protected, until far off in the indefinite future when divisions and subdivisions of Eastern farms, developed to their best capacity, no longer afford homes or sustenance adequate to our population, we shall be forced to open up these lands by some such plan as this.

Surely, as one living in an Eastern State, surrounded by Eastern farmers, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania has correctly stated the facts, I ought to be the last one to stand here to vote for a measure which will reduce my neighbors and friends to poverty and distress.

So I had a curiosity to make an examination into the agricultural data of Massachusetts to see whether his statements were substantiated by the actual facts. I find that in Massachusetts, whose total area is 8,040 square miles, 4,917, or 61.2 per cent, are included in farms. The total number of farms in the State are 37,715. The increase of farms in the last decade in Massachusetts is 9.7 per cent. The value of farms in every county in Massachusetts increased, except in the county of Dukes, which is a small island in the Atlantic Ocean. The number of farms in 1900 exceeded the number of farms ten years ago by 3,341. The total value of live stock increased 11.2 between 1890 and 1900. The average gross income per acre for all the farm lands in the State was $10.81. There is an average ownership of 103 farms to every 100 owners. All of these farms, with the exception of a very few, report an income, and those very few are run by wealthy men for pleasure, and no income is reported from them at all.

Now, the agricultural data of Pennsylvania has not been prepared by the Census Department, and I was only able to obtain a few figures. But I find that the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will hardly stand the test of examination. The value of farm products in Pennsylvania in 1899, as compared with 1889, show an increase of $24,978,432, or 20 per cent increase in value during the last ten years.

Now, lest I may be considered as having selected Eastern States making the most favorable showing, I want to call your attention to the banner State for abandoned farms, New Hampshire, as showing the trend of agricultural development in the eastern section of the country. Out of its 5,640 square miles included in farms, 1,300 are embraced in the White Mountain region, which has a rocky and unproductive soil. Indeed, it is only near the coast and river valleys that the soil is very fertile. The islands, without skillful and energetic management, can not successfully cultivate either vegetables or cereals. Since 1850 there has been a decrease in acreage under cultivation. The New Hampshire farmer realized that wheat and corn could not be raised amid rocks and bowlders in competition with the Western farmer; that he must make a readjustment of farm methods; that the intensive cultivation of small areas of the most fertile soil must supersede the general cultivation of the land; that the cultivation of cereals must be abandoned, and dairy, poultry raising, market gardening, and fruit take their place.

While this evolution has occurred, the total farm acreage in fifty years has increased only 6.4, and unimproved land has increased to a marked degree; yet the total value of farm property has increased since 1850 $19,410,073, of which over 25 per cent, or $5,634,520, must be credited to the last ten years. The value of farm products in 1899 was 54.4 greater than 1889. An examination of farm valuations in detail shows a like satisfactory comparison, demonstrating that the New Hampshire farmer, meeting the requirements of evolution in farm production the West has created, has by attention to the local demand which a rapidly increasing urban population has brought about enriched himself in fields in which no rival can compete and in which he was never more secure or indispensable.

No, the New England farmer does not confine his vision to the few acres which surround his ancestral home by the slopes of the New England hills or along the rivers where his farm is located. [Applause.]

He looks beyond the artificial boundaries which separate his from contiguous States to the fertile prairies of the West, even to the Rocky Mountains, near which the arid lands are located. He knows that the prosperity of one section of his country is reflected to every other; that every section is bound together by an indissoluble chain, one link of which can not be weakened without imperiling the whole; that where the manufacturing interests of the East are depressed the markets for Western products are curtailed, and when the crops of the West fail our manufacturers find a limited demand for their woolens, cotton goods, boots and shoes, machinery, and implements among the Western farmers.

The great home market, first of all, must be protected in accordance with the doctrine long maintained in New England, and our whole country is that market, for our transportation charges are so low and our freight facilities so great, unhampered by taxation or restrictions, that for trade purposes every State is as one domain.

PROVIDES FOR OUR SURPLUS POPULATION.

There is another matter of inestimable importance to the New England farmer, laborer, and merchant. For years a tide of immigration, like a great billow, has been rolling in upon our shores. On an average for twenty years, yearly, nearly half a million foreigners have settled here. I append herewith the figures as furnished by the Immigration Bureau:

Number of immigrants arrived in the United States each year from 1882 to 1901, both inclusive.

Period.	Immigrants arrived.	Period.	Immigrants arrived.
Year ending June 30—		Year ending June 30—

1890	455,302	1900	448,572
1891	560,319	1901	487,918

In 1891 487,918 immigrants settled in the United States; of this number, 148,686 had no occupation, 54,753 were farm laborers. For the first four months of this year 233,087 arrived—an increase of 51.3 per cent over the same period for 1901. The number arriving in May surpassed any previous May in our history, indicating that the number this year will exceed even the banner year of 1882. I append another table, indicating for the last four years the countries from which they came:

What becomes of this vast swarm of people, exceeding each year the population of two of the New England States, any one of the three new Territories which, by the vote of the House, we admitted to statehood, as well as many States west of the Mississippi. They are diverted to the great manufacturing States in the North Atlantic division of the country. Sixty-five per cent of them are congested into New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Boston, and our manufacturing cities and towns. They crowd out the American wage-earner from the avocations through which he has earned his livelihood. Unaccustomed to the luxuries and content with a tithe of the necessities of life which the American laborer has enjoyed, able to exist on a portion of the wage paid to the American citizen, he has superseded him to a large degree in unskilled work, driven him from his Eastern home, sent him to the undeveloped West, and forced him to the homesteads a generous Government has given.

What shall be done in view now of the scarcity of farm lands for homesteaders in America? Can we divert this foreign population to where competition will not strangle the American wage-earner and place it where new fields await development? How are we going to do it? I remember watching the chairman of the Immigration Committee while he was waiting like "patience on a monument smiling at grief" for his bill to be brought up. It is true that we attached to that bill an educational test, which I heartily approved and voted for, but remember that a bill with such a provision has been for months slumbering at the other end of the Capitol. We have never had an immigration law that was restrictive. They have simply prohibited the landing of idiots, the insane, and those who, by physical incapacity, would be a charge upon the public. I am in favor of drastic measures on this subject, but have little hope of seeing them enacted into law. So I favor this bill, under which the intelligent, progressive, loyal, and patriotic American can have opened up for settlement lands capable of supporting 30,000,000 people and provide employment for our surplus labor until some enactment by which intelligent and assimilative immigration, not detrimental to the laboring people of this country, can be secured.

SURPLUS PRODUCTS FOR OUR ORIENTAL TRADE.

So generally have the humid public lands been entered upon that land values in sections of the West have already advanced to over $20 an acre, and it is said that 25,000 American citizens have left Wisconsin, Minnesota, and adjoining States to open up farms in Canada during the past year. While the reclamation of the arid lands protects and creates a home market, it will also furnish our surplus products for the oriental trade, whose expansion has been marvelous during the last decade. These lands are a thousand miles nearer the Pacific than they are to the Atlantic coast. Our interoceanic railroads bring them into close communication with the Pacific ports. We can form no conception without an examination of the strides our oriental trade is making. The tonnage of San Francisco in 1900 was 3,025,969, an increase in one year of 348,444 tons.

Ten years ago Seattle did not have a steamer leaving her port for the Orient. To-day there are four regular lines from that city. The wheat exports of Puget Sound have increased 5,000 per cent in twenty years and 500 per cent in ten. Its tonnage in 1900 was over 2,277,000, and the total imports and exports nearly $30,000,000. The exports to Japan have increased since 1881 from 6 to 17 per cent of the total trade of that country, and the United Kingdom, our chief rival in that trade, which supplied over 52 per cent of those imports in 1881, furnished but 20 per cent in 1901. Our exportations to that country have multiplied 240 times in this period, and we now stand second in foreign commerce there among the nations of the world. The demand for shipping facilities on the Pacific coast has swamped the resources of every transportation company.

Six new steamers will enter the Pacific coast Orient trade this year, capable of carrying 575,000 tons of freight a year. It must be remembered that the Orient can not increase its own food production to any great extent. The limit of agricultural development appears to have been reached in Japan and China. Even in Siberia, which has been supposed to be a fertile country adapted to wheat, it is found that climatic conditions are an insuperable obstacle to successful agriculture, and travelers mark upon the banks of the Amur the great stacks of American wheat and flour. Even now a famine is blighting that country, and while their mines, fisheries, and forests teem with wealth, the necessaries of life must be imported, and should be largely imported from the United States. We occupy the vantage ground. No nation is so well equipped and so accessible as our own. Study the manifest of a Pacific steamer. Observe the enormous quantity of canned goods, dried fruits, and provisions—indeed, all that the arid lands reclaimed would produce—and the problem of the disposition of a surplus or any competition even with Western farms is solved. The market is found, a market but just opening its doors to American trade, a market where hundreds of millions are buyers, to pour their gold into our country to benefit and enrich our people. The development of the country! Home building for the people!

There are in all about 60,000,000 acres of arid lands capable of reclamation, a territory as large as that of the States of Iowa and Illinois combined. It is estimated that about 20,000,000 acres will be reclaimed directly by the Government and 40,000,000 acres by private effort. These lands are distributed over 13 States and 3 Territories and extend from Canada to Mexico. On an average, it is thought that 500,000 acres can be added to our irrigated lands yearly, requiring thirty years for the completion of the work. There is no direct charge upon the Treasury, inasmuch as the cost is to be defrayed from the sale of the lands and water rights attached thereto. They are of little value now, from 20 to 40 acres being required to raise a steer, which 1 irrigated acre will be sufficient to accomplish.

This is no new and experimental project. Irrigation has been successfully undertaken for many centuries. India affords a striking illustration of its beneficent results; not the methods of the natives, employed until a recent period, utilizing only the excess water of the rainy season, but its conservation and equable distribution in times of drought. During the British domination of one hundred and twenty years, 22 famines, caused by cessation of rain and consequent failure of crops, have desolated the country. In the Behar famine of 1873–74, 750,000 laborers were employed in relief work for nine months, 450,000 persons received gratuitous relief daily for six months, and the Government was subjected to an expense of nearly $30,000,000. In 1877, in Madras, 1,131,000 were relieved, and in 1896–97 34,000,000 were affected, and 2,200,000 daily were fed by the Government for one year. In the famine of 1900 the loss of life above the average was 1,236,855, and more than $30,000,000 were expended for personal relief.

In 1865 irrigation for the first time seems to have been attempted to meet the crisis soon to come; not formulated on the crude devices of the natives, but carried out under the administration of experts appointed for that purpose. It accomplished much, but disappointed expectations until the storage and reservoir systems contemplated by this bill were inaugurated. Then, in one famine year in one district alone, the products raised amounted to four times the value of the entire capital involved, and 800,000 immigrants from congested districts were supported on an area of irrigated land of 1,353,000 acres, besides the aid afforded to those beyond. Lord Curzon said, in his budget report of 1900:

I want to be sure that no sources of water supply or water storage are neglected in this country.

Claus Spreckels is not a name to conjure by, nor can his personality be held up for imitation, yet as a captain of industry he has given us an object lesson in irrigation. He went to Honolulu, secured the ear of King Kalakaua, and made arrangements with the planters to control their product. Sugar planting in Hawaii is very expensive; all the land has to be irrigated. He found 10,000 acres of apparently worthless sand which he leased for a trifle from the King. He dug a canal 21 miles long with 30 tunnels cut through solid rock and brought water to these lands at an expense of half a million dollars. He organized the Hawaiian Sugar and Commercial Company, whose estate on the island of Maui is the largest sugar plantation in the world. It covers 40,000 acres and has an unbroken stretch of cane fields 15 miles long and several miles wide. It is irrigated by two ditches—the one 40 miles and the other 20 miles long, and carrying between them over 100 cubic feet of water per second. From this plantation alone 60,000 tons of sugar are yearly produced.

Six million five hundred thousand acres of arid lands in this country have been brought into the market by irrigation, the larger portion in the State of California. Southern California, where irrigation prevails, is a veritable paradise, whither the great tide of American travel flows as the frosts and snows chill our Northern lands. Here under the cloudless skies, fanned by balmy winds, amid the perfume of flowers and sheltered by waving palms, the traveler lingers. But longer lingers in memory the orange groves waving around him, with their golden fruit, and the vine-clad deserts blossoming like the rose, where a few short years ago the wolf stole across the sands. So irrigation has transformed that land, and likewise will the lands this bill will reach, building up the country beyond "the dreams of avarice" in what is indeed the wealth of a nation; but better than all, in peoples and municipalities, where homes reign, and integrity, patriotism, honor, and the decalogue are inculcated in the rising generation.

And soon or late a time will come
When witnesses that now are dumb
In grateful eloquence will tell
From whom the seed here scattered fell.

[Applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of great regret to me that I find myself compelled to vote, as I feel I must, against this measure in which I find so many of my friends on this floor interested. My remarks to-day, however, will be limited to a few desultory observations upon an entirely different subject.

I have endeavored, Mr. Chairman, to not only take a lively interest in all that occurs on the floor of the House, but also to read carefully the legislative record. My labors in that regard are not quite up to date, and so it is that I have just reached page 4621, upon which I find, commencing the somewhat remarkable speech made by my friend from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN], who I am glad to observe is now present, as he always is, attending to the wants of his constituents.

A committee engagement did not permit me to hear his speech, but I have read a great deal about it in the newspapers and have read it carefully in the RECORD. There is matter in it which calls for most serious consideration, not only from me, but from every member of this House. Some of his statements have caused me to look about to see where, under the rules and practices of the House, I and other members stand.

The gentleman asserts that no matter how meritorious a measure may be he is utterly powerless to bring any bill or measure to a vote, and that all of us are in the same predicament. He blames the rules of the House, the Committee on Rules, and the Speaker. He says: "We have adopted a set of rules in this body that are an absolute disgrace to the legislative body of any republic," and that in electing a Speaker, "We put a club in the hands of some one else to beat us to death." He has behind him, he says, "an honest but infuriated constituency," demanding that he shall secure for them certain legislation.

You have all heard the conundrum, "What is the result when an irresistible force encounters an immovable body?" The gentleman from Washington has not fully answered that, but has shown the result of getting mixed up with such conditions, for it appears from his statement that he, standing between the irristible body of his "honest but infuriated constituency" and the immovable body comprising the rules of this House, Committee on Rules, and Speaker, the impact has left him "thinner than a canceled postage stamp."

He tells us that we are all "a lot of human midgets and legislative Lilliputians," bound down by the rules and our prostrate bodies sat upon by the Speaker, who uses the Committee on Rules as a club with which to beat out our few remaining brains. He threatens us that, to use his own words, "unless there is a change in the manner in which this body is run, I will give you a life-size imitation of an incipient revolution" right here "under the Dome of the Capitol."

Now, all this is becoming very serious. If the gentleman from Washington is right in his premises, perhaps we had better join with him and start a legislative Mount Pelee eruption right here in this body that will cover with dust, ashes, and red-hot oblivion the rules of the House, the Committee on Rules, and the Speaker himself, so that he shall no longer, as the gentleman says, "bestride the narrow world like a Colossus," while we poor "human midgets and legislative Lilliputians" "walk under his huge legs and peep about to find ourselves dishonorable graves."

But if the gentleman from Washington is wrong, then let us do what we can to protect ourselves, the rules, the committee, and the Speaker from the molten lava of his inflammatory and combustible oratory.

Mr. Chairman, an old-time preacher with an old-time use of pronouns addressed his congregation thus: "I will take as my text this morning the verse of Scripture, 'For the devil he goeth about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour,' and I will divide my discourse into three heads: First, 'Who the devil he is;' second, 'What the devil he is roaring about,' and, third, 'Who the devil he is seeking to devour.'"

I do not mean, Mr. Chairman, to compare my genial and distinguished friend from Washington to any character mentioned in the Scriptures. It is not necessary to inquire who he is, as everybody knows him and appreciates his ability and his wit. But as he did not particularly specify, I have had some curiosity to know just what he and his "honest but infuriated constituency" were roaring about.

I find upon a hasty examination that my modest friend, who styles himself a "legislative Lilliputian," has succeeded in having passed through this House at this session the following items for the benefit of his district:

For the purchase and installation of machine tools at navy-yard at Bremerton, $50,000.

Naval station, Puget Sound, additions and extensions, $748,500.

For purchase of site for naval magazine at Puget Sound, erection of buildings, etc., $50,000.

For construction plant, naval station, Puget Sound, $75,000.

For machinery plant, Puget Sound Navy-Yard, $125,000.

For a public building at Seattle, the cost of which was originally fixed at $250,000, afterwards increased to $750,000, he has succeeded in getting $900,000 through the House.

Public building at Spokane, $60,000.

Public building at Tacoma, $60,000.

Mr. MERCER. Will the gentleman correct his statement right there? It should be $100,000 for Spokane and Tacoma each. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. The increase was made in the Senate. I am not referring to what Senators may have done, but what the gentleman himself has accomplished right here in this House and under these rules.

Mr. MERCER. Well, he labored very hard to bring that about.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Was all this before or after the gentleman from Washington made his speech?

Mr. OLMSTED. I think before. [Laughter.]

Improving Olympia River, $25,000.

Improving Tacoma Harbor, $75,000.

Improving Grays Harbor, $50,000.

Improving New Whatcom Harbor, $25,000.

Improving waterway connecting Puget Sound with Lakes Union and Washington, $160,000.

Improving mouth of Columbia River, Oregon and Washington, partly in Washington, $500,000.

Improving Upper Columbia and Snake rivers, $25,250.

Improving Columbia River at Three Mile Rapids, to be paid out of former appropriation, amount not stated.

Improving Cowlitz and Lewis rivers, $9,500.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman will allow me to ask how much the gentleman from Washington would have got if there had not been any rules? [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. I am coming to that.

Improving Puget Sound and tributaries, $15,000.

Improving Swinomish Slough, $30,000.

Improving Okanogan and Pend Orielle rivers, $10,000.

Four private pension bills, giving, respectively, $20, $25, $30, and $40 per month.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the whole State of Washington does not pay into the Federal Treasury as much revenue as the Ninth district of Pennsylvania, in which I live.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What "gentleman from Washington" is referred to as getting all these things?

Mr. OLMSTED. I am referring to the gentleman's colleague [Mr. CUSHMAN].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Did I have anything to do with it? [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. I infer not, because the gentleman's colleague said in his speech—I quote from the RECORD—

> I represent a Congressional district comprising the entire State of Washington, a Congressional district with half a million people in it.

[Laughter.]

His remarks led me to forget that there were two of you. But there is glory enough for both in the accomplishments I have stated.

Now, if one "legislative Lilliputian," or even two, bound down by the rules and sat upon by the Speaker, can accomplish all that in one session, what under heaven would a full-grown legislative giant accomplish? I tremble when I think of the condition of the Federal Treasury if the rules were unloosed, the Committee on Rules discharged, the Speaker beheaded.

Mr. LESSLER. Right behind the ears.

Mr. OLMSTED. Close behind the ears, as the gentleman suggests; his revolution successful, the Committee on Rules abolished, and the gentleman from Washington in position to call up and pass his own bills at his own pleasure.

Now, most of those appropriations were secured how? By the aid of this much-abused Committee on Rules, which took up those bills out of their order from the Union Calendar, brought them in here, sustained by the majority of the House, and put them through for the great benefit of the gentleman from Washington, his constituents, and his district. What would he have accomplished had he not been bound down by the rules and sat upon by the Speaker?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What is the aggregate?

Mr. OLMSTED. I can hardly stop to contemplate so large an amount. [Laughter.] Now, what is his constituency infuriated about? What more do they want? Why all this roaring? I have had occasion to look and see what bills, without referring to his colleague, the one gentleman from that district has offered. I find they are 93 in number and for the following purposes among others:

First, to establish a mint at Tacoma, $200,000; providing also for the appointment of a superintendent at $3,000 and two lesser officials at the trifling salary of $2,500 each, to be appointed by the President, presumably upon the suggestion of the author of the bill. I am told that the Secretary of the Treasury says that the mint is unnecessary, and that if it were necessary, $200,000 would not build it.

Now, further, the gentleman would like a public building at Tacoma to cost $750,000; to increase the limit of cost for the public building at Seattle to $1,000,000.

To establish light-house and fog signal at Burrows Island, Washington, $15,000.

To establish light-house and fog signal at Burrows Island, $15,000, and fog signal at Battery Point, $6,000.

To establish fog signal at Battery Point, $6,000.

To establish dwelling for keeper of fog signal at Robinson Point, $4,000.

To authorize new building at New Dungeness light station, Washington, $4,500.

Appropriating $1,500 for the expense of determining "the best available locality in Oregon or Washington at which to establish a biological station for the investigation of questions affecting aquatic life and the fishery interests of the Pacific coast, and to report thereon at the next session of Congress," when undoubtedly an appropriation will be asked for the said biological station.

To increase the limit of cost of light-house and fog signal at Browns Point, Washington, $9,200.

To establish life-saving station near Cape Flattery, Washington.

Increasing compensation of district superintendents in Life-Saving Service to $2,500 each.

Directing Secretary of Treasury to pay $415.12 to Eben Pearce, of Tacoma.

Providing for a public building at Olympia, Wash., at an expense of $200,000.

Authorizing payment of $2,062.51 to Patrick Buckley, Indian agent at Tulalip, Wash.

To establish gas buoys at five different points, at $3,000 each.

Appropriating $2,222.08 to Raymond O. Williams and $200.54 to Joseph A. Springer.

To establish light-house and fog signal at Muckateo, Wash., $2,000.

A resolution authorizing Secretary of War to cause survey to be made "for the purpose of reporting upon the probable cost and advisability of constructing a portage railway near Celilo, in the State of Washington."

A resolution authorizing Secretary of War to ascertain and report "the probable cost and advisability of dredging a single continuous channel to deep water in the Chehalis River."

To order $3,000 paid to Thomas Hayne, of Washington.

Appropriating $73,000 to Peter Larsen.

To establish a military post at Tacoma, $150,000.

Authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase the Isham shell and Tuttle's thorite, $100,000 for the patents. Whatever thorite may be, I have never heard that the Secretary of War in his report, nor the President it his message, has indicated any pressing public need for those articles, even at the trifling expense of $100,000 for the patents.

Now, after all that, and notwithstanding his own capacity in that direction, my friend wants to establish five "gas buoys" at an expense of $3,000 each, and finally introduces a bill "to promote a conference to formulate a universal language," appropriating $5,000 for the expense thereof. [Laughter.] I understand that the language is to be one in which all the members of the House may speak at the same time, each upon his own bill, which will be necessary when the rules are abolished. [Laughter.]

Now, what are any of us to gain by destroying the rules? Why, the gentleman says—I read from the RECORD:

> We need to restore this House to the great patriotic plane on which the founders of the Republic placed it, where every individual member on this floor stands upon an equal and exact plane with every other (except the Speaker, I assume, who will have no plane and no power at all). The way this House was intended to be run by the mighty men who conceived and fashioned our constitutional Government was that the members of the House were to inform the Speaker what legislation they intended to take up, and not that the Speaker should inform the members what legislation he would permit them to take up.

Well, now, let us see what "the mighty men who framed our constitutional Government" did say. In the first place, Mr. Jefferson, who ought to know something about it, says in the preface to his Manual:

> The Constitution of the United States, establishing a Legislature for the Union under certain forms, authorizes each branch of it "to determine the rules of its own proceedings." The Senate has accordingly formed some rules for its own government; but these going only to few cases, they have referred to the decision of their President, without debate and without appeal, all questions of order arising either under their own rules or where they have provided none. This places under the direction of the President a very extensive field of jurisdiction, and one which if irregularly exercised would have a powerful effect upon the proceedings and determination of the House.

And yet that is just where our friend wants to place us, without any rules, going right back to the mighty framers of the Constitution, and putting all the power in the hands of the Speaker. Why, no Speaker for half a century has had any such power as the Speakers had in those early days.

And as to the rules, Mr. Jefferson quotes approvingly Mr. Onslow, whom he styles the ablest speaker of the House of Commons, as saying that there is nothing that tends so much to put power into the hands of administration as neglect or absence of rules.

Now, did those mighty men who framed our Government leave in the hands of the individual members the right to call up their bills? Here is what Jefferson says, and he ought to know better, perhaps, than the gentleman from Washington. He says in his Manual:

> The Speaker is not precisely bound to any rules as to what bills or other matters shall be first taken up, but it is left to his own discretion, unless the House on a question decides to take up a particular subject.

That is where the mighty framers of our constitutional Government placed the matter, and that is where the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] thinks he wants it put back; or rather he did not think that was where they had left it. He had evidently never investigated. If he puts it back where they left it, he will leave it wholly in the power of the Speaker to call up any bill he pleases, unless by some united action the majority of the House calls for some other bill.

We do not leave that unbounded power and discretion in the hands of the Speaker. The present rules provide an Order of Business. Rule XXIV, page 285 of the Manual, says:

1. The daily order of business shall be as follows:
First. Prayer by the Chaplain.
Second. Reading and approval of the Journal.
Third. Correction of reference of public bills.
Fourth. Disposal of business on the Speaker's table.
Fifth. Unfinished business.
Sixth. The morning hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees.
Seventh. Motions to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.
Eighth. Orders of the day.

Now, so far as I can determine, sifted out and boiled down, the complaint of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] is that we do not go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration generally of bills on the Calendar often enough to suit him. Well, that is not the fault of the Speaker. We have a rule on that subject. Section 5 of Rule XXV provides that—

5. After one hour shall have been devoted to the consideration of bills called up by committees, it shall be in order, pending consideration or discussion thereof, to entertain a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or, when authorized by a committee, to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider a particular bill, to which motion one amendment only, designating another bill, may be made; and if either motion be determined in the negative, it shall not be in order to make either motion again until the disposal of the matter under consideration or discussion.

Now, my friend has probably not been watching his opportunity, because several times other gentlemen have gotten the House into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union during this session, notably my venerable colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW].

But there are other reasons why we do not go into committee as often as the gentleman from Washington would like, as often as I would like, as often as other members having bills upon that Calendar would like? And why is it? Why, Mr. Chairman, it is because the great appropriation bills, carrying in the aggregate nearly a billion of dollars, are privileged. It is because all revenue bills, raising revenue to run the Government, are privileged. Contested-election cases and certain other matters are, by the rules of the House, privileged.

Therefore, when the chairman of one of these committees calls up one of those bills and asks to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union it takes precedence over the motion of my friend to go into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of his particular bill which is not privileged. And is not that right? Is it not just as important that these great appropriation bills shall be carefully considered and four or five million dollars of unnecessary appropriations lopped off here and a few more there as it is that we shall take up time in considering a two-hundred-thousand-dollar appropriation for an unnecessary mint at Tacoma or Seattle? Will not all agree that it is necessary that these bills must be privileged?

And then, again, the Committee on Rules, just as it has done to-day, brings in a rule to take up some bill in which a great body of members are interested, to take it up out of its order and consider it just as we are considering this bill, just as we considered the oleomargarine bill, the river and harbor bill, and a dozen other bills that I could mention, which are all more important than some private bill.

Therefore they take precedence and they shut us out. But is not that as it should be? If it is not right, any gentleman—even when the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations presents a privileged appropriation bill—any gentleman can raise the question of consideration, and if the majority of the House do not want to consider it, they can vote not to take it up. When my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] brought in this resolution this morning, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] or any other gentleman could have raised the question of consideration, and it could have been put aside had a majority so desired.

If the majority of the House want to take up that mint bill which he desires, to pacify his "infuriated constituency" all he would have to do, if a majority was with him, would be to refuse to consider any other bill and then, under the rule, the Speaker would be bound to recognize a motion to go into Committee of the Whole upon the Union Calendar generally. The trouble is that the majority is not with the gentleman. Is there any wrong in that? I remember that upon one occasion, just before his bill was reached, a majority of the committee determined to rise. That was not the fault of the rules nor of the Speaker nor of the Committee on Rules. If anybody was at fault it was the majority of this body, which must always have its way.

The gentleman from Washington says:

I have seen this body adjourn three and four days at a time when the Union Calendar was freighted with hopes of voiceless millions. No, sir; it does not lie in the mouth of this body or any member of it to say that it is lack of time. It is lack of inclination and not lack of time that ails this body.

Well, that is a complaint against the whole body. If it adjourns, it is not because of the rules, nor of the Speaker, nor of the Committee on Rules. It must be on account of the desire of the majority of the members to adjourn.

We can not act on every bill. If every gentleman had offered as many bills as has the gentleman from Washington there would be a grand total of 33,394. As a matter of fact more than 14,000 have been offered at this session. It would take ten years to carefully consider and fully debate all these bills, while the life of one Congress is only two years. Why, my friend has nothing to complain of.

The gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations, served here for twenty years before he got through a bill for his own district; and yet my friend has got through all these appropriations in one session. He can not expect to get everything at this session. He and his colleague have done wonders already. I think that his "infuriated constituency" can not do better than keep him here the balance of his life if he is willing to serve, for no man who came before him and no one who will come after can do more than he and his colleague [Mr. JONES] have accomplished.

Mr. MANN. Is this intended to circulate in his district? [Laughter.]

Mr. OLMSTED. There is no objection. [Laughter.]

That debate is not entirely curtailed here is evidenced by the fact that the gentleman himself covered eight broad double-column pages in the RECORD, covering a wide range of topics, as witness the large-typed subheads of subjects as we find them in the RECORD. First, I find that he spoke upon the subject of the "Rules of House;" second, "Reciprocity;" next, "What William McKinley said;" then "Declarations of Republican national platforms;" then "What Blaine said." The next head is "An overproduction of sugar," and the next "An overproduction of wheat," and the next "Our duty to Cuba." Then comes "Duty to the child;" then "What we are willing to do for Cuba." The next head is "PAYNE'S reciprocity—Democratic free trade." The next head is "GROSVENOR." The next large head is "Abusing GROSVENOR." [Laughter.] And then the next head is "The beaters of tom-toms." And, finally, "The heart of Bruce." [Laughter.]

Now, there seems to be unlimited debate. Who says this is not a deliberative body? I do not find that the pages of the legislative record have decreased in number since the present rules were adopted. Some of them were adopted many, many years ago, and some of the most important in the Fifty-first Congress. A comparison of the results of legislation under the old rules and the present ones, compiled by Mr. Wakefield, our tally clerk, I find in the Calendar of March 4, 1901, the last day of the Fifty-sixth Congress. It appears that the Forty-ninth Congress, sitting three hundred and thirty days, passed 424 public acts, 1,031 private acts, and 266 joint resolutions—a total of 1,721.

The Fiftieth Congress, sitting four hundred and twelve days, passed 570 public acts, 1,257 private acts, and 269 joint resolutions, a total of 2,096. That was under the old rules. The last, or Fifty-sixth Congress, under the present rules, with our present Speaker and present Committee on Rules, sitting only one hundred and ninety-seven days, passed 443 public bills, 1,498 private acts, and 567 joint resolutions, a total of 2,498.

That is to say, the Fifty-sixth Congress, under the present rules, present Speaker, and present Committee on Rules, sitting two hundred and fifteen days less than the Fiftieth Congress, under the old rules, passed 402 more bills and joint resolutions, and sitting thirty-three days less than the Forty-ninth Congress passed 777 more bills and joint resolutions. Certainly the gentleman from Washington will gain nothing by destroying the present rules and going back to the old ones.

He makes some complaint about unanimous consents. Now, our present Speaker, when elected to that exalted position, did not lose any of his rights as an individual member of this House. When unanimous consent is asked for, he has the same right as any other member to object and thus prevent the consideration of a bill out of order.

Looking at it from another standpoint, when a number of members are pressing to be recognized to make motions for unanimous consent, as the presiding officer, he must select the one who shall be recognized. Every member has several bills for the passage of which he would like unanimous consent. We can not all be recognized at once. There is not time in the session nor in the life of a Congress to consider all of our bills.

Looking over the RECORD I find that during the last Congress the gentleman from Washington was recognized four times to call up bills by unanimous consent. If there was any discrimination it was in his favor, not against him. He got more than the average recognition. The RECORD discloses also that during the last Congress more bills were by unanimous consent taken up out of order than at any previous Congress for many years. No rule can be framed that will make it possible for every man to have all his bills considered when the volume is so great and the life of a Congress so short.

All things being equal, the older and more experienced members of any organization or body of men have always greater influence. It has been so from the beginning of the world; in every State legislature, in every railroad board, in every school board, and in every other organization throughout the country and throughout the world. Naturally the older and more experienced members of this House, on either side, do have more power and influence than those of us who have seen shorter service.

I am not one of the older members, having been here but one term longer than the gentleman from Washington himself. It is not in my province to defend the rules of the House. I am not wedded to them. If any better ones can be suggested, let us adopt them. But the attacks upon them are always made in the plural—in the aggregate. The gentleman from Washington has not designated any particular rule that he would like changed. They are manifestly the best rules for the prompt dispatch of business that have yet been devised, and yet there may be room for improvement.

Neither am I called upon to defend the Committee on Rules. It is composed of members, of both political parties, of long service and acknowledged wisdom in legislative affairs. That the resolutions they bring in are those that meet the approval of the majority of this body is evident from the fact that they are almost invariably accepted and adopted.

I find also that there is generally little, if any, difference of opinion between the Democratic and Republican members of that committee as to what particular bill shall be taken off of the Calendar and presented for the consideration of the House. It is wholly unnecessary for me or anybody else to defend the Speaker from attack. He needs no defense. For fairness and impartiality his record is absolutely unimpeachable.

No man can truthfully say that he has ever unfairly or improperly used the power which we have placed in his hands. He merits and possesses our confidence to-day, even more fully than when we first addressed him as "Mr. Speaker." No doubt he would be glad if every member could have a chance to have all his bills considered, but he owes a greater duty to all of us than he does to any one of us, and a greater duty to the people of the United States.

Furthermore, like ourselves, he is bound by the rules. He is a splendid Speaker, able, alert, and fearless in the discharge of the duties of his great office, wielding that club of which the gentleman speaks very gently, and far more ready to pat my friend from Washington upon the back than beat him to death with it.

Let the gentleman from Washington be patient. He has already accomplished much. His honest constituency has no excuse for remaining infuriated. I implore him to withhold his threatened revolution. He has already promised not to tear down the Republican party. When he delivers his promised speech "printed on asbestos paper" and "tied to a hand grenade for safe distribution," let him deal gently with the rules, the Committee on Rules, and the Speaker. Let him bear in mind the motto which, it is said, was once suspended over the heads of the orchestra at a ball in a Western mining camp: "Don't kill the fiddlers; they are doing the best they can." [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, the extent of our country to which this legislation directly applies is limited to 13 States and 3 Territories. The lands to be actually irrigated are but a very small fractional part of the vast area of that western empire which lies beyond the Missouri River. But the influence of this legislation upon the prosperity and welfare of the Republic will be as wide as our national domain. There are several phases of this subject which are open for discussion. There is its legal or constitutional limitations, its practical application or technical side, and its business or commercial aspect.

I am myself entirely satisfied as to the constitutionality of this measure and I shall leave the discussion of that phase of the question to the members of the House who are learned in the law, as that will probably influence your judicial opinions, but I shall confine my remarks to a discussion of the commercial and business side of the matter as to how it will affect the material interests of your constituents at home, as that is what will determine your votes. And I do not criticise, but rather compliment, those members who are opposing this bill if they think that its results will be prejudicial to the interests of those who sent them here.

I have learned in my short service in this House that no matter what we may say here upon this floor, that in the cloakroom or in the public press our votes upon all questions not involving human rights are accounted for as being determined by the way in which they affect the welfare of our constituents. In its last analysis this is purely a business question, and members will vote for or against it from the standpoint of its effect upon values in their respective districts.

This is entirely an American question, and I congratulate Congress and the country that after legislating for months upon questions concerning Cubans and Filipinos—all sorts and kinds of peoples from Porto Rico to Timbuctoo—that at last we have before us a matter which comes right home to the interests of the American people themselves—a question which means more to the progress and growth of this country, to its commercial greatness and its material welfare, to its prosperity and its national glory than all the other questions that we have had before us in this Congress all summed together.

The effect and value of a development of a nation's resources by means of irrigation is perhaps better understood by almost any of the older civilized nations of Europe than by ourselves. Civilization and irrigation were born together, in the arid regions surrounding the Mediterranean Sea and amid the dry highlands of western Asia and India. Because irrigation is the most scientific form of agriculture, it required a certain degree of development in civilization before man could apply it to nature. But in America our civilization is not indigenous, but transplanted from across the seas.

The first touch of its progress was upon the humid shores of the Atlantic, and it has pressed steadily westward, always finding, until very recently, sufficient lands watered by the rains from heaven to amply supply the inborn spirit of commercial expansion and development that has ever been the dominant motive in American advancement and growth. It is only in the last decade that we have come to realize that our lands which are watered by rainfall alone are already occupied, and that from this time forward the effort of the economist and statesman must be to increase the productiveness of those lands which now form the basis of our great agricultural wealth, and, second, to make possible by irrigation the use of those that now lie barren and unproductive.

Because of a misunderstanding as to the actual conditions which surround the development of irrigation in the West, the water supply, the climatic conditions, the labor problem, the markets, the means of transportation, and the character and quality of the crops produced, there are a number of objections urged against any plan whereby the Government shall permit the Western States to practically work out their own salvation upon the irrigation question, with but a trifling expense to the General Government; for that is what this bill seeks to accomplish.

I have studied diligently to determine what is the real source of the opposition to this measure, and both from conversation with other members and from the speeches of those who have spoken upon this floor against the general principle of irrigation development in the West, such as that made by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] and others, I have come to the conclusion that nearly all of it is based upon the fear of disastrous competition from the agriculturists of the irrigated country with those farmers who live in the humid regions of the Mississippi Valley and further east.

There seems to be a belief that the stoppage of the development of the West will have a tendency to raise the value of farm products in the country eastward of the Mississippi River by limiting production, and thereby also enhancing the value of Eastern farm lands. This is the modern trust idea, developed into a national agricultural movement and is the dominant motive and principle that underlies all combinations in restraint of trade, and against which we are all professing to be prodigiously opposed, from the President in his Executive Mansion at the other end of the avenue down to the commonest Congressman in this House.

Carried to its complete reduction and logical conclusion by our forefathers, this idea would have precluded the desirability of any development or expansion of our domain west of the Allegheny Mountains. This policy is narrow and sordid, and has nothing to commend it in the past experience of this country or any other nation. How much more glorious and in keeping with the experience of these United States in the past is that principle of national political economy which teaches that trade and commerce between the different portions of our great common country has been the chief factor in our continued advancement in national wealth and prosperity; that as one portion of our country develops its possibilities of wealth and commerce all other sections of this great Republic grow with it, and as the sun and the stars have each a glory of their own, so the different portions of our great commercial empire producing those crops and commodities peculiar and profitable to itself which, all united into one great stream of American trade and commerce, have made our wealth and prosperity the wonder and the admiration of the world.

The people yet hunger for lands upon which to build, by industry and toil, free American homes for themselves and for their children. As evidence of this fact we have only to remember how Oklahoma filled up almost as if by magic when once the Government gave the homeseeker permission to enter her borders. Open up a new Indian reservation and there will be a thousand applications for every homestead. Already numbers of our best class of American citizens, our young and vigorous farmers, finding themselves unable to gain a foothold for an independent home here upon our own soil are emigrating into Manitoba, Alberta, and the Northwest Territory and are becoming subjects of Edward VII.

The development of the Western irrigated farms can never depreciate the value of Eastern farm lands, because of reasons which are founded upon facts and not upon mere suppositions or theories. First, because the areas which can ever be irrigated in the arid regions of America are very limited and are scattered in isolated valleys over an extent of country equal to more than half of the entire United States outside of Alaska. Like oases in the desert, they dot the great Rocky Mountain divide from Manitoba to Mexico and from the eastern slope of those great mountains, which are aptly termed the roof of the world, westward to the Pacific Ocean.

The demands of the country contiguous to these productive spots will always greatly more than absorb their possibilities of production. In spite of all that the irrigated country can ever raise in fruits, in grains, and grasses, the growth of the cities of the West, of her mining and live stock industries, will always make her an active and profitable market for the products of the Mississippi Valley, which is, and always will be, the granary of the American continent.

This is no idle statement, but is based upon the actual experience and known conditions existing in that country. Corn, oats, and wheat are as high priced in the Rocky Mountain regions to-day as they are east of the Allegheny Mountains, although only three hundred miles eastward of the foothills of the Rocky Mountains—in eastern Nebraska and Kansas and western Iowa and Missouri—these grains are produced cheaper than in any other place in the world.

The irrigated farms, because of the immense labor that must be put forth to irrigate and redeem them, the expense of the application of water, and the known fact that the cost of labor on an irrigated farm amounts to from three to five times that of a farm in the humid regions, precludes any possibility of the irrigated farm being anything but a high-priced farm. The labor cost alone upon some of the irrigated farms of the West and Southwest amounts to $35, and even $40, per year per acre. But very few crops can be profitably raised at such an enormous expense, and they are only profitably raised when the price of the crop is correspondingly very high.

It is absolutely impossible that any of the great staples of the farms of the Mississippi Valley, or of the South or of the East, can ever be raised by irrigation and sold successfully in competition with the farmers of the humid regions. Even at the high price which these products command in the arid regions of the West, because of their limited supply, the profits from the irrigated farms can not be compared with those of the farms of the Mississippi Valley for the same amount of labor expended.

The irrigated farm lands, being very high-priced lands, can in no wise affect the values of the lands to the eastward of them, as did the sale by the Government of the rich lands of the Mississippi Valley and the great plains beyond at $1.25 per acre affect the values of the farm lands east of the Allegheny Mountains. The great cost of labor and of the water and the quality of the soil make the intensive style of farming absolutely essential to profitable agriculture in that arid region, and would always preclude any danger to the Eastern farmers from competition with the products of irrigated farms, did not climatic conditions also absolutely forbid it.

The most sanguine irrigationist can never hope that by that means we can ever raise a sufficiency of the products peculiar to that soil to supply the home demand alone. The development of our agricultural resources in those distant regions is not with any object of finding markets for their surplus products in the Eastern States. We need it all there where it shall be grown to support our mining and mineral industries, our growing cities, and our mighty herds of live stock.

The possibilities of our future mining and mineral development and the increase of our population rest for their support upon the products of the farm. All the great cities of the Rocky Mountain country must draw their supplies of food from them, and the labor necessarily incident to the successful operation of the great mines in the mountains can only be obtained by cheapening the cost of living to a reasonable figure. The irrigated valleys will simply be great centers of agricultural activity which will sustain and make possible the growth of our live stock, mining, and lumber industries.

The danger of competition from an irrigated country to a great, rich, and fertile country like the Mississippi Valley, which receives its supply of rainfall from the free hand of nature, is absolutely chimerical and has no foundation in fact, in possibility, or in business experience. But general statements and broad comparisons of conditions only lead to superficial understanding of questions. It is only by coming into actual contact with things and learning the details of an enterprise by experience that we learn anything that is of actual value to us.

Let me illustrate: I remember that when I started eastward for this capital I waited with great interest the hour when I should enter the historical confines of the great State of Pennsylvania, because my people had settled there amid her mountains almost two hundred years ago, and I had often heard my father tell of the riches and glories of that grand old Commonwealth. I had been told by a gentleman in whom I had great confidence that in the southwest corner of that State was centralized more productive capacity and material wealth than in any other spot on earth; that there was built up that collossal fortune that has spread libraries all over these United States and has made its owner almost despair that in spite of his utmost endeavors he will yet be disgraced by dying rich, and which has finally culminated in the most stupendous industrial combination ever known to man—the United States Steel Corporation.

But when I looked out of the car window on a dreary November morning and caught my first glimpse of Pennsylvania soil and saw her bleak and barren hills, her rocky valleys, her stony farms and her rivers red from the wash of her clay and sand, I said to myself no wonder my father left this cheerless region as soon as he was able to travel alone and sought the fruitful and fertile soil of Illinois; and the thought came to me that if I were to bring a steer from the green pastures of beautiful Nebraska and turn him out to fatten upon these mountains I would never dare to look a steer in the face again. [Laughter.] But that was only my provincialism asserting itself.

I had judged the situation with a superficial eye. I was a son of the prairie, born on the level stretches of Illinois and reared on the great plains at the foothills of the Rocky Mountains, and when the train soon dashed into the limits of that great center of titanic industries and commercial activity—the city of Pittsburg—and then out and across the hills and down those historic valleys and rushing rivers where great manufacturing cities are strung one after another along her railroads like beads upon a string, I began to understand what it was that made all these seeming worthless and barren lands so valuable, and how completely dependent upon these centers of industry the rest of the people of that great Commonwealth are, and to know why she is indeed and in truth the Keystone State, second in population and wealth among all the States of the Union; and when I think that these distinguished gentlemen, who represent Pennsylvania upon this floor, would tell us that all this industrial activity, this world of wealth, this great home market has been made possible because a kindly Government has given a fostering care to her manufacturing industries, and know that her products find their chief outlet not to the East, but to the South and West, the thought comes to me that it ill beseemeth a Pennsylvania Representative to protest against legislative encouragement to Western enterprise and development.

And, Mr. Chairman, what the manufacturing cities along the water courses of Pennsylvania and the East are to that country so will the irrigated valleys and plateaus be to the mountain and plain regions of the great West and Southwest. They will be the centers of commercial activity and development, both in material wealth and in higher civilization, which will ultimately make for the advancement of that great region and the whole nation as well. [Applause.]

How narrow and petty seem all these policies of commercial foot binding and provincial isolation when once we come to know by business experience the utter folly of it all. I have said that concrete illustrations of actual facts beat all the glittering generalities in the world of rhetoric. Let me give you an illustration of something that has come under my personal observation, of something that I know of the effect of the development of a single industry in the arid regions. The people of the State where I live will get no direct benefit from this measure.

If any farmers can be hurt by competition it is the farmers of Nebraska and Kansas, who, by reason of their proximity to the irrigated country, must be the first to feel the effect of this development. But our people live out in the West where the horizon is big. We grow grain cheaper than any people upon earth. We make pork and beef cheaper than you of the East can do. It is we who have hammered down the price of your Eastern products by our competition, but we now ask you to help us to find a marker for our surplus products to the Westward and give you the only relief that is possible to you, because in competition with your high-priced lands we can meet you and undersell you if you force us to accept no other market.

But we are on the very edge of this coming development and we already feel its touch and thrill and know what it means. But for my illustration. At the eastern base of the foothills of the Rocky Mountains flow a number of goodly streams all rolling down through the plains of Nebraska to the sea. Along these rivers in Colorado are some of the oldest and best developed irrigation systems in the United States.

Colorado is second only to California in the extent and magnitude of her irrigation development, and there we may logically look for practical examples of what irrigation will do when it is highly specialized. The early settlers along the Cache Le Poudre, the Big Thompson, and the Platte rivers, who took Horace Greeley's advice and went West, like all other immigrants from Eastern States, attempted first to raise the grains and grasses which were common in the humid States from whence they came; but experience is a great teacher, and they soon found that the soil and climate there were especially adapted to the production of the potato, and presently the reputation of the Greeley potato, which took its name from the principal colony at Greeley, Colo., named in honor of the great New York editor, was known the length and breadth of the land over wherever "spuds" were bought and sold, and all potatoes grown by irrigation in the Western country came to be known by the generic name of "Greeleys."

But the continual cropping of the Colorado farm with wheat and potatoes exhausted it as rapidly as the same treatment exhausts the lands of Pennsylvania or Virginia, and something had to be found to renew the quality of the soil or their entire industry was ruined. So these intelligent farmers turned their attention to finding some sort of clover that could be profitably grown in that country—that wonderful leguminous plant so invaluable to the farmer because it has the unique quality of storing the soil with the nitrogenous matter so essential to the growth of other plants while yet producing a valuable crop itself.

They found this plant for which they were seeking in the alfalfa clover or lucerne, now so commonly grown throughout the West and Southwest wherever irrigation is practiced. Alfalfa clover is in some ways the most wonderful forage plant which the intelligent agriculturist has yet learned to utilize in this country. Under the conditions that exist in the irrigated regions in eastern Colorado, which I am describing, this plant produces three and four crops of hay each season that is richer in protein—the flesh-forming chemical ingredient of grains and grasses—than any other forage plant of which we know.

This alfalfa made a perfect crop for the purpose of rotation and renewing the soil for the further production of potatoes and wheat, but because of its enormous productive capacity it looked for awhile as if the alfalfa would become a drug on the market because, with the great amount of open range at that time available to stock growers, the cattle yet rustled upon the buffalo grass and found sufficient rations for the style of stock growing that was then prevalent in the country. But the farmers did not feel that they could afford to grow the alfalfa only as a means of fertilizing their fields.

Some other market must be found for the hay. An enterprising farmer, who knew something about sheep and how to feed them, conceived the idea of buying up a bunch of Mexican or Colorado lambs, shipping a carload of cheap corn from Nebraska, putting the lambs into a feed lot, and feeding them upon alfalfa hay and Indian corn. In the spring, when these lambs were finished to his satisfaction, he loaded them into a car and shipped them to the city of Chicago, consigned them to a commission merchant whom he knew, who offered them for sale.

The lambs were fat and the buyer from one of the big packing houses in the city liked their looks and bought them. They killed out exceedingly well and after being well cooled in a refrigerator they were sent to one of the uptown markets, where a caterer from one of the high-priced hotels in that great city came looking for some choice spring lambs and was shown these carcasses from the far-off foothills of the Rocky Mountains.

They looked good to him, and he bought and took them to the chef of that great hotel, who served them up as roast lamb should be served, garnished with green peas, with the juices of the lean and the fat leaking all over and down its sides, and, finally, they were served upon the table, and then the hour had come when a Chicago epicure was to first experience the delights of tickling his palate with a choice morsel of an alfalfa-fed lamb; and I have searched through history and literature to find another gastronomic epoch as important as this, and I can find only one that compares with it, which is the one so graphically described by Charles Lamb in his "Dissertation upon roast pig," when Bobo, the son of Hoti, first stuck his scorched fingers in his mouth and tasted the divine essence of the roasted cracklings of a baked pig; and like the celestial youth when he tasted the pig, or Oliver Twist with his mush and milk, those who first tasted of this Colorado lamb asked for more, and so the chef sent the caterer back to the market for more lambs.

And the man in the market went back to the packing house for more of those lambs for his customer, and because in every packing house a complete record is kept of every purchase, the manager was able to ascertain the name of the commission man from whom he bought these lambs. The commission man was told to buy more of them if he could find them, and he looked in his account sales and found the name of the shipper and that the lambs came from Fort Collins, Colo., a name then unknown to fame, but now known wherever good sheep or good mutton is prized by men.

And the commission man wrote to the farmer in Colorado to ship him more sheep like his first shipment, if he had them, and he would pay him the top market price. And the farmer told his neighbors of his profitable experience, and they grew more alfalfa, and bought more lambs, and bought more corn, and fed more sheep, and shipped them to Chicago and to all the markets of the East, and made more money; and the business grew and grew until they could not find the lambs in Colorado to supply their feed lots; and they scoured the whole Rocky Mountain country over to find them; and other irrigated regions took up the lamb-feeding business, until it has affected very profitably the sheep industry of the entire nation, and I do not know how many lambs were fed in the vicinity of Fort Collins in the winter of 1901 and 1902, because I have been here at Washington and have not sought the information, but in the winter of 1900 and 1901 there were 500,000 lambs fed in the territory tributary to that town, consuming over 5,000,000 bushels of corn, purchased from the farmers of the Missouri Valley, and that is only one center of the sheep-feeding industry, which has rapidly extended from the irrigated valleys of Montana, through Wyoming, Utah, Nebraska, and Kansas, wherever alfalfa can be grown and corn be purchased at a price that is not prohibitive.

The sheep and lamb feeders of the irrigated regions of the West have sustained upon a profitable basis the sheep industry of the nation. Millions upon millions of sheep in that country were formerly grown for wool alone, but the sheep feeder has changed all that. The carcass is now more profitable than the pelt, and in spite of the fact that wool has steadily declined, the price of sheep on foot has continued to advance, and the mutton makers of the irrigated regions of the West are responsible for it all.

The sheep feeders of those regions competing against each other for the lamb crop of the mountain country, that holds two-thirds of the flocks of the entire continent, advanced the price of lambs $1 per head, and made sheep growing universally profitable throughout the West. The increasing demand for better sheep and more of them, especially for the combined mutton and wool producing breeds, made an enormous demand for the pure-bred stock from Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Illinois, New York, and other Eastern States, and added millions upon millions of dollars to the value of sheep wherever they are grazed in this country. If indeed the sheep has a hoof of gold, as tradition tells, it was fittingly found by the American farmer in the irrigated valleys of the greatest gold-producing State of the Union, the State of Colorado.

And what the farmers of the irrigated region have done for the sheep growers of America they are rapidly doing for the cattle-growing industry as well. The day of the great range herds is past. The grass is so eaten off each year that the cattle can no longer rustle and live through the long winters without being fed grains or grasses that are grown and harvested by the labor of man. There is no grass left in all that great Western country that will make beef except in Montana and in portions of Wyoming and South Dakota, and the cattle and sheep men are already fighting for the control of that region like dogs over a bone.

Western ranching is rapidly becoming a feed-lot proposition. The cows and the calves must be fed during the winter or there is no profitable growth or increase. They are already consuming millions of bushels of grain bought from the farmers of the Missouri Valley, but only a tithe of what they will consume in the near future. It is the inevitable evolution of the cattle-growing business throughout the West.

Already they are competing with the Eastern markets for the corn and oats of western and central Nebraska and Kansas, and in a few years, in the natural course of development that must go on there, if you will assist us, they will remove from competition with the Mississippi Valley the great bulk of the corn from the cheap lands west of the Missouri River that now is the most potent factor in the control of the prices of the grain markets of this country.

And the fact that the cattle must be kept in smaller herds and handled in a much more expensive manner and upon high-priced feed requires that the quality of those cattle must be greatly improved in order to make their production profitable with all this added expense, and the ranchmen of the western country have been scouring the whole eastern portion of the United States for blooded cattle to improve their herds, and have added millions of dollars of value to the herds of all those regions, and they are the very backbone and foundation of the high prices for cattle that your producers of fine stock have been receiving for the last four or five years. So much for the scarecrow of competition from irrigated lands with the older settled regions of the country.

Instead of irrigation bringing competition to you of the Mississippi Valley and eastward, it will take away from you the competition that has been the hardest for you to meet—that of the cheap but productive farms west of the Missouri River, by furnishing the people in those regions a new and better market close at home.

Make our cheap lands high priced because of making us a market farther west and you will do the one thing that will do more than all others combined to make secure the high price of your own farm lands. But so much for the Western country as a market for your agricultural products. Let us look for a moment at what these States and Territories that are asking for this legislation have done and are doing by way of providing markets for the products of your manufactories and your mines in the East, and thereby offering greatly increased opportunities for your laboring men who toil in them and who operate them.

This is a commercial age, and ours the greatest commercial nation in all the world to-day. We must have markets to maintain our supremacy or our prosperity falls. The battle of the future will not be fought by armies for conquest and empire, but rather by the peaceful emissaries of trade to control the markets of the world. The nation will not be the most powerful that has the greatest enlisted armies or the most powerful battle ships upon the seas, but the one which, because of her commercial greatness, shall control the wealth of the world.

I do not wish to inject any politics into this discussion, nor will I, but we have been reaching out after markets across the Pacific Ocean and spending many millions of dollars in the attempt to, so we profess, in some way improve the condition of the people in the Philippine Islands. No matter how we may differ upon this question in general, I think we will all agree that they do not at present seem to appreciate all the expenditure in money and in effort we are putting forth in their behalf.

I am opposed to extravagance and waste in appropriations of public funds, but I am willing to say if we must expend hundreds of millions of money, taxed from the pockets of our own people, I would rather spend it here at home in the interest of the American people to provide free homes and opportunities for American citizens than to spend it on the other side of the world upon a people who do not seem to love us, who do not love the flag, and who would never rise to defend it in its hour of peril. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman of the Appropriations Committee, if you will give us in the West a little of the money that you spend so freely in other portions of this country and in other portions of the world as well, we will build for you broader and better and closer markets than any you can find beyond the seas. We will build up a nation of men better than any you can find upon the other side of the world, because they will be white men, men of the mountains and men of the plains, men who will buy your goods and fight your battles for you, men who can ride far and shoot straight, men who will be the foundation of this nation's prosperity and credit in time of peace and the bulwark of her honor and glory in time of war. [Applause.]

Give us the opportunities for expansion and development offered by this legislation, and it will not be necessary to compel our appreciation of these blessings by a display of military power. [Applause.]

Let me give you a few figures by way of comparison of what we have already accomplished in that Western land in providing a market for you at your very doors. The commerce of the United States, both in imports and in exports, with the Philippine Islands in 1901 amounted to $5,427,706. The entire trade of those islands with all countries, both in exports and imports, in 1901 amounted to $55,500,000. Our entire export trade with all Asia and Oceania, including China and Japan, amounted in 1901 to $87,000,000.

The surplus products of the State of Nebraska alone, products that we sold to other States in exchange for products bought from them, amounted in 1901 to $225,555,160.89, as shown by the report of our bureau of labor and industry for that year, amounting to more than double that of all of our exports to the entire Orient with its 800,000,000 people. Yet, Mr. Chairman, the State which I have the honor to represent in part upon this floor contains a population of only a little over 1,000,000 of people. One million against 800,000,000, but the 1,000,000 people are white men and American citizens, and that tells the whole story. [Applause.] And we expended 90 per cent of that surplus with the people of the other portions of this Republic in the payment for goods and the settlement of our obligations, and the 10 per cent of profit upon it we deposited in our home banks, where it was immediately redeposited in your Eastern banks, and forms to-day a portion of the basis of credit upon which you carry on your commercial transactions; so you practically receive the benefit of it all.

This nation sold to the other people of the world of her manufactured products in 1901 the enormous sum of $412,000,000 in value. The surplus products of Nebraska, Kansas, and Colorado, only three of the thirteen States that are asking for this legislation, amounted in 1901 to over $775,500,000. You sold us goods for all of that which you did not receive in settlement of our prior debts to you. The surplus products of Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, Colorado, and South Dakota amounted in 1890 to almost $900,000,000 in value, and yet the entire population of those five Commonwealths was only 3,877,570 in 1900.

Where else in all the world can you find a market that is of such value to you at present or offers such possibilities in the future, and which is absolutely all your own? The question is, Is the American Congress to-day big enough and broad enough to assist us in opening up the greatest natural opportunities and advantages yet left for national development in any place in all the world?

Mr. Chairman, this question is greater than the Philippine question, greater than the Cuban question, greater than the isthmian canal question, because of its great benefits and the magnificent opportunities that shall flow from it. It means the best markets and the best homes for the best nation on earth, and all the happiness and the prosperity which shall follow in its train shall be the common heritage of the American people, and nothing can take it from them. [Applause.]

This legislation appeals to me especially, because it is in the interest of our great agricultural population—a class of people who receive little enough consideration from the American Congress. No matter how much we may boast of our manufacturing and mining wealth, the growth of our cities, and our financial greatness, yet, in the finality, the farmer is the foundation of us all.

Like Atlas of old, he bears the very business fabric of the nation upon his back, and though at times bowed down by weight of woe because of panics or disasters which others bring upon the country, yet after the storms have rolled by if we will but let the farmer get his broad shoulders underneath our commercial structure once more and give him but a moiety of profit in his business, a little of the legislative justice to which he is entitled, he will stand again erect and in his rising he will lift us all. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, just a word. In the Fifty-second Congress, ten years ago, I had the honor to be chairman of the Select Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands in this House. There were pending before that committee numerous bills relating to irrigation, and also concerning the reclamation of arid lands. After long deliberation the committee reached the conclusion that the proper solution of this question was the cession of the arid lands to the different States and Territories in which they were situated. Accordingly we reported a bill to that effect. I wish, as a part of my remarks and by way of my contribution to this debate, to reproduce in the RECORD the report then submitted and the bill then proposed.

The report and bill are as follows:

The Select Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands in the United States, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6790) for the reclamation of the arid lands of the United States, and for other purposes, report the same to the House and recommend its passage.

Sundry bills, resolutions, memorials, and petitions have been referred to this committee during the present Congress relating to the subject of irrigation and the proper disposition of arid lands, the general trend of which has been favorable to the proposition of relegating these lands and the problems involved to State and Territorial control and administration.

The greater number of them has been of a general character, while others have been of local application, but all have been marked with the same distinct feature and uniform object, discovering a noticeable concurrence of opinion upon a subject-matter of vast public importance.

The vacant public domain of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, the Cherokee Strip (not yet opened to settlement), and certain other lands now claimed by Indians, is estimated by the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office at 579,664,683 acres, surveyed and unsurveyed, in approximately equal proportions. The principal amount of this land is situated within what is known as the arid region, embracing the greater portion of the territory west of the ninety-seventh meridian of longitude, and contained chiefly within the boundaries of the States and Territories named in the bill to which, respectively, it is proposed that cession shall be made by the United States.

According to the estimates of Government officials the arid region, including the semiarid plains, embraces 1,340,000 square miles. Of this about one-fourth lies in the Great Plains region east of the Rocky Mountain, which is principally arable land; another fourth is embraced in the Rocky Mountain belt, not more than one-third of which is arable; three-eighths lies in the Great Basin and Plateau region between the Rocky Mountains and Sierra Nevada, about one-half of which is arable; while the remaining one-eighth is embraced in ranges of the Sierras, and is in the main rocky and unsusceptible of cultivation. It is estimated that about one-fourth of the arid region is composed of rocky or mountainous nonarable land.

Major Powell, Director of the Geological Survey, has expressed the opinion that 100,000,000 acres of this arid region can be redeemed by irrigation through the utilization of stream waters.

Mr. Newell, as shown in Census bulletins, estimates that 70,000 acres of land are now irrigated in the semihumid plains region, and that about 4,000,000 acres are irrigated in the arid region proper. It can not be stated with accuracy what amount of irrigable lands yet remain unreclaimed.

The greater portion of the land proposed by the bill to be ceded is in its present condition of little practical value, but is capable of being appreciated beyond computation by processes of irrigation; but to accomplish its reclamation and successful development will require long time, careful treatment, and great expenditure of money. It is now comparatively an arid waste, forbidding to the home seeker, though fraught with untold possibilities. This land, urged by the necessities of our mighty civilization—the demands of our large and constantly increasing population for homes—the necessary development of its latent, though incalculable resources, cries out for redemption from its now unprofitable condition.

It is not in keeping with the progress of the age, the growth and dignity of our country, and the wants of our people that it should remain in its present unproductive condition. It must be rendered habitable. It can not, and ought not to, remain a perpetual wilderness and destitute of useful results. Either the United States must sooner or later accomplish its reclamation by direct appropriations from the Federal Treasury, by the construction and maintenance of irrigation works and the operation of the multiplied and manifold agencies for its development, or, failing so to do, it must leave it to the States and Territories within which it is embraced, in their own way to work out that salvation which is possible.

If the Federal Government is to do this work it may well take notice that the ultimate demands upon its Treasury will be enormous, far beyond any present accurate calculation, but certainly at an expense far in excess of anything it has yet encountered for any specific object of internal improvement, reaching even billions of dollars. Nor can the point be overlooked and ignored that if the National Government shall undertake the execution of this immense enterprise it must perform that function in an impartial and comprehensive manner; it can not afford to lavish its expenditures on any favored locality, but it will be constrained, in all fairness and propriety, to treat the distinct, special, and local problems of reclamation in a suitable way wherever they may arise, as well in one State or Territory as another.

To do all that will be expected of it, and that the exigencies will require, will be simply impossible of accomplishment. Nor is it believed that the taxpayers of the country remote from the arid region will be induced to consent to the outlay necessary for such a purpose. When the magnitude and far-reaching consequences of such a proposition are considered and understood in all their phases, it is reasonable to assume that thoughtful, prudent, and economic men will conclude that the General Government, essaying this object, has a work upon its hands from which it may well pray deliverance, if that deliverance can be had in a manner consistent with sound public policy, just to the whole people, advantageous to the people most directly concerned, and upon their voluntary acceptance of the burden and assumption of the responsibility involved.

If the General Government, with full knowledge of the colossal undertaking, will covenant with our Western people to go ahead with the enterprise, and prosecute the same to a successful conclusion, no serious objection is likely to be interposed by the States and Territories in the arid region. The immediate beneficiaries of such bounty would doubtless enter no protest. But the people of those States and Territories, recognizing the prevailing sentiment and realizing fully all the difficulties which encompass the situation, have reached the conclusion that the General Government will never do this work. They despair of any such prospect.

It would prolong this report too much to attempt an elaborate and detailed review of all the National Government has already done, the labor and money it has expended, the investigations it has conducted, the explorations it has made, the reconnoissances it has projected, the differentiations of irrigable lands it has disclosed, and the useful information and scientific data it has furnished in relation to the subject of irrigation and the reclamation of arid lands.

It has maintained bureaus. It has employed experts. It has made surveys, topographic and hydrographic. It has measured rainfall. It has gauged streams. It has defined catchment and drainage areas. It has located reservoir sites. It has investigated storm waters and their utilization, torrential flows and their conservation, the waters upon the earth and the waters under the earth, conditions of climate, the best methods of cultivating the soil by irrigation, and the agricultural results and possibilities which follow. It has even bombarded the skies and sought through explosives to wring waters from the reluctant clouds.

It has experimented in every field and quarter where any promise was offered for valuable result. It has sent out special and select committees, who have visited and examined the uttermost parts of the country in search of useful knowledge as the basis of appropriate legislation; it has created and organized committees in both Houses of Congress, which have spent months of time in hearing and yet longer periods in deliberations; it has furnished exhaustive reports, compilations, statistics, and suggestions; it has printed books, published volumes containing information, foreign and domestic, and issued instructive maps; it has invested all sources of research; it has reserved from settlement certain irrigable lands, and then again it has reopened the lands to occupancy which it had formerly segregated; it has experimented in legislation, as well as scientific examination, until it would seem that the era of education is completed and that the processes of national instruction may be discontinued without serious detriment to the Government.

It is not intended to underrate the importance and value of the great body of the work done by the Government in this connection; on the contrary, it must be conceded that much of it has been exceedingly useful and will be beneficially appropriated in the future. It has served to initiate careful inquiry and has apprised the people of what has been and may be accomplished in this and other countries. It has stimulated them by the wonderful solicitations to development and rewards to investment of effort and capital which it has discovered.

Why should the Government desire to longer retain proprietorship of this arid region? Why, for that matter, should it now have a vast domain of unappropriated public land? It only holds lands as a trustee and until they can be suitably settled and occupied, and is presumptively interested only to the extent that actual bona fide settlers may be accommodated. It is not supposed that it wants to retain them in order that they may be donated to corporations or given away as subsidies. Enough of that has already been done. Its administration of the land system in the past has not escaped severe censure.

The most valuable and desirable part of the public lands has long since been disposed of, and the time has come when the inducements to actual settlers upon the remaining portion must be supplemented by such development as will render it desirable for homes.

It must be tickled with water before it will smile in fertility and attraction to the homesteader, and yet the Government wants it to be occupied. The moment any settler perfects title to his homestead the Government cheerfully makes its transfer, and that settler becomes a citizen of the State wherein his land is situate, adding his taxable values to the State and his contributions to its material prosperity, maintaining his dual citizenship of the State and the United States. If the Government retains public lands for actual settlers, it is but a delusion, unless those lands are put in such condition as to make settlement possible. Having parted with its best lands, shall it continue to hold the refuse, when it is apparent there will be but few, if any, takers?

Is it economical for the Government to continue the administration of the arid lands and support the expensive machinery and supervision therewith connected in consideration of the proceeds derived from the sales of such lands for homestead purposes? Is not the outgo greater than the income from the standpoint of actual settlement? There is not likely to be any material diminution in the cost of such administration, while there is a comparative present exhaustion and will be a continued future limitation of lands available for actual occupancy, and must be a corresponding decrease of the amounts of money received from the sales of such lands.

It would seem that the Government is now engaged in a losing business from this point of view and that such loss will continually enlarge and grow more serious by pursuing the existing policy, until all the supposed heritage in these lands will have been absorbed and consumed by the cost of their administration. In this view of the case it would appear advisable for the General Government to relieve itself of the embarrassment under which it labors, if it can find some competent authority willing to assume the responsibility and to which the matter can be legitimately committed.

Attention is invited to that portion of the last Report of the Commissioner of the Land Office under the title of "The irrigation of the public lands," and especially to the following recommendation:

"A wiser plan, it seems to me, would be the transfer of the land and water to the direct control of the States, subject to such limitations and restrictions as would insure the reclamation of the land by the States and the transfer of title from the State in the first instance to actual settlers in quantity not exceeding, say, 160 acres of land to each settler."

Notice is also directed to his statement in the same connection in relation to the previous granting of "swamp lands" by the General Government and the unsatisfactory experience which ensued, as a sufficient argument in response to the alleged danger of the policy involved in the cession contemplated by the provisions of the bill now reported.

After a careful review of the whole question, we have arrived at the conclusion that the General Government will be benefited—that it will gain rather than lose by the proposed cession; that it will gain in the speedy reclamation of and settlement upon these lands; that it will gain in the acquisition and increase of a strong and self-supporting Western population; that it will be benefited in the opportunity that will be afforded for an outlet for its present and prospective millions of landless and homeless people, who now crowd, and will in future overflow, its dense and more populous Eastern States; that additions to popular well-being and prosperity will ensue; that fresh stimulus will be given to the States and Territories immediately interested to earnest endeavor for their own development; that local self-government, in all the problems involved, will assert its forces; that civilization will be advanced; that rich, waving fields and comfortable homes will make glad the solitary places which now abound in this dormant and unproductive region.

What will, what can the Government lose? What citizen, what State will begrudge their proportionate contribution of the heritage remaining in this fragment of the public domain to the people who are to redeem it? What sacrifice to either will be involved in surrendering these now barren wastes and hills and mountains? They will not go to aliens, but to our own people. It is worthy of notice that no serious protests from any Eastern State against the objects sought to be accomplished by this bill have found their way to your committee, notwithstanding the long time they have had the subject under consideration, and the public notice which has been given concerning the character of the measures upon which they have been deliberating.

We have been forcibly impressed with the conviction that suitable legislation upon this subject is imperatively demanded and can not well be longer postponed. Our conclusion is that the only solution of the question will be found in ceding these lands to the States and Territories. That this policy will ultimately prevail we confidently predict.

Can the States and Territories administer the trust which it is proposed to commit to their hands? Will they do so wisely and well? It is not contemplated that the burden shall be forced upon them. Their voluntary acceptance must precede the actual cession. It will be left to them, in their own sovereign capacity, to determine for themselves as to whether they will receive the grant.

We are led to believe that they will accept, with the conditions and reservations defined and stipulated. The Western people, almost with one accord, have united in asking this cession; they have signified their purpose and desire through legislative memorials; through the expression of large and representative conventions; through the resolutions of the great irrigation congress held at Salt Lake City in last September, composed of delegates from ten States and two Territories, and through numerous petitions from different parts of the country. That they are in earnest about the matter there seems to be no room for doubt.

A sufficient answer to the inquiry as to the ability and competency of the States to deal with this question is the fact that they are States, clothed with all the paraphernalia of statehood, invested with the power and charged with the responsibility of conducting their own affairs and conserving the liberties, property, and happiness of their people. If they can not be safely trusted in all that concerns the well-being of their citizens within the sphere of State legislation, then their existence as States is a blunder and a reproach and they ought to be remitted to mere dependencies upon the Federal Government. They are presumed to be intimately conversant with their own immediate necessities and conditions, and confidence must be reposed in the virtue and intelligence of their people.

If their legislatures are accessible to corrupt compassings, the responsibility will rest upon the people who choose them. If the voters of a State can make a wise selection in the case of a member of Congress, no reason is perceived why they can not exercise the same judgment in the election of a State legislator. Western men, as a rule, reflect as high types of real manhood, in all its better elements, as adorn American character in any quarter of the Union. They are heroic, patriotic, energetic, and self-reliant, and can be depended upon for the performance of all the duties and obligations which devolve upon them.

If an illustration be required of the capacity of a State to administer its land system without supervision or interference upon the part of the General Government, the State of Texas, with its immense area, will furnish an instructive example. It has held out its own encouragement to immigration; it has invited capital in its own way; it has granted its lands at its own pleasure, both in preemptions in aid of education and for internal improvement; it has issued its own patents and exercised, without restraint, its own judgment in the disposition of its public domain.

It is content with its own management and would revolt at interference. It retained its lands when it entered the Union, without limitation or restriction upon its powers of administration and disposition. It is proud in its sovereignty of the soil and has demonstrated its ability to regulate its own affairs and execute its own land policies. It may be well argued that, with all the experience of the past and the benefits to be derived from the many lessons which that experience will afford, the States to which the cession may be made will prove themselves equal to the task they undertake. There is no apparent hazard in allowing them to make the experiment.

The objection which may be urged against the cession to the Territories before they are admitted as States of the Union, the doubt that the people would act wisely in the discharge of the trust, that the legislation on the subject might be reckless, and thus defeat the object to be attained, is largely met by pointing to the success which has attended the irrigation and reclamation of arid lands in the Territory of Utah. Irrigation in the United States by white men began in Utah in 1847, and has proved a most gratifying success under wise and conservative legislation, based largely upon actual experience. The waters have been so distributed and utilized by the settlers as to produce the very best results. Considering the scarcity of water and the vast area irrigated, there have been comparatively few conflicts over water rights.

The showing in the recent United States census of agricultural development gives a fair conception of what has been accomplished in that Territory. Crops were raised by irrigation in the census year ending June 30, 1890, on 263,473 acres, or 411.68 square miles, a trifle over five-tenths of 1 per cent of the entire area of the Territory. The aggregate number of farms was 10,757, and of these 9,724, or about nine-tenths, depended on irrigation, the remaining tenth being either stock ranches or farms in the northern end of the Territory, where the climate is less arid, or situated so high on the mountain sides that crops can be raised by what is known as "dry farming."

The irrigated farms in Utah are small, averaging from 20 to 30 acres each. It has not been the policy of the people of Utah to encourage the acquisition of large bodies of land, and the monopoly of water has been impossible. The laws were made to encourage and protect the settlers. The small holder had an equal opportunity for his proportionate share of water with the large holder. "The greatest good to the greatest number" is the prevailing idea and has always been strictly enforced. Water rights are considered sacred, and no theft is regarded more despicable than the theft of water in the irrigating season; no misdemeanor is more quickly or severely punished.

A people who in the past, under the most adverse circumstances, have done so much to reclaim the arid lands, who have turned what had been considered deserts into fruitful fields, may be trusted to manage the arid lands within their borders; besides the power will still remain in Congress to disapprove any legislation which the Territories may enact. These considerations would seem to remove any serious apprehensions in regard to making cession to the Territories. It has not been thought advisable to impose too many restrictions upon freedom of action by the States and Territories which may accept the provisions of the bill; all necessary power and discretion ought to be left with them.

The quantum of land that may be disposed of to any person, corporation, or association is limited to 160 acres. This, it was believed, would have the effect of preventing monopolies and syndicates from securing possession of large bodies of these lands to the detriment of the rest of the people, and might serve as a restraint upon rash legislation in this respect should the same be attempted.

The mineral lands are reserved to the United States. These lands have not been distinctively classified, and the special localities where minerals may exist can not be satisfactorily designated, but must be left in a great measure to the discoveries of prospectors. From the nature of the case it is impossible to specify the extent of these lands. They are usually found in mountainous localities unsuited to agriculture. It is not believed that material confusion and conflicts of jurisdiction are likly to arise in consequence of this reservation. Some advantage may result by the General Government's maintaining a uniform system of mining laws, applicable alike to all the States and Territories.

The forests and timbered lands are included in the cession. The following extract from the memorial of the Salt Lake City irrigation congress is a strong statement of the relation of the forests to the subject of irrigation, and presents, in brief, cogent reasons for embracing these lands in the grant:

"No mention is made in the resolutions of the congress of the preservation of the forests, but the subject is too intimately associated with that of irrigation to be divorced. The coniferous trees, such as constitute the timber growth on the mountain and elevated plateaus of the West, are exceedingly inflammable, and when once fire is communicated to them a vast destruction of values ensues. The loss from this cause, measured by the stumpage value of the timber alone, may be estimated without extravagance at $100,000,000 per year. The Federal Goverment has made some efforts to arrest this destruction, but wholly without success.

"It is from the States, or local agencies created by the States, that protection must be sought. To the settlers the preservation of the forests is a matter of grave importance. They are dependent upon them for fuel, fencing, and building materials; but this is by no means the limit of their interest. The forests on the mountain tops are the chief conservators of the waters that are to irrigate the valleys below. With their destruction the reclamation of the arid land ceases to be a problem and becomes an impossibility. An efficient and just system of preserving the forests from destruction by fire and applying them under proper restrictions to the use of settlers can not be otherwise provided and administered than by the States."

These are not the only reasons which support the proposition, but are deemed sufficient for the purpose of this report and to serve as a basis for more extended future discussion.

The committee, in their deliberations, have not overlooked the difficulties in the matter of interstate waters—the possible exhaustion, for irrigation purposes, of the waters of streams rising in and flowing through and from one State to another State or Territory before they reach the boundary line which divides them. They have realized the trouble involved in equitable distribution and prior appropriation of such stream waters, as well as the conflicting interests which may arise. Illustrations and object lessons in this connection, both of an interstate and international character, have not been wanting. These difficulties and conflicts, in the opinion of the committee, can not be removed nor obviated in any satisfactory manner by legislative enactment.

One State may possess natural advantages as to water and otherwise, which have not been provided for its adjoining neighbor, nor can the fortunate possessor of such natural advantages be debarred from the reasonable and necessary enjoyment which they afford. No legislation can equalize these conditions; nor is it probable that one State, knowing its natural advantages, would enter into any agreement with its less-favored neighbors which might involve the surrender or diminution of its existing superior conditions. Voluntary arbitration of differences are improbable, and appointive commissions could not adjust the inequalities.

There are periods of scarcity of water in these interstate streams, as well as flood times, attributable to natural causes. In the one case, the supply is wholly inadequate to the necessities of any considerable number of settlers upon their courses, even near the sources; in the other case, there is such a superabundance as to be even dangerous and destructive in localities remote from the sources. Statutes can not regulate these conditions, nor can interstate agreements control them. It will require more work and greater expenditure upon the part of some of the States and Territories than others to conserve and utilize the waters necessary for irrigation. More artificial agencies, such as constructing reservoirs, impounding storm waters, building dams, restraining and diverting torrential flows, and boring artesian wells, will have to be employed by one State or Territory than another, dependent upon its peculiar situation and environments.

Irrigation conveys the idea of supplementing and relieving natural wants by artificial means. The less favor nature has extended any given State or locality in affording it permanent water supply, the greater will be the burden to be overcome and the more exertion and expense will be required to cure the defect. Each State and Territory affected by the bill will, it is believed, better understand and more thoroughly appreciate its own peculiar condition and the specific problems which require solution, than it will be possible for Congress to do, and when it accepts the cession proposed it will do so with full knowledge of the responsibility assumed; it will take the grant cum onere, and upon its wise administration of the power conferred will depend its own prosperity and future success.

The lands which will be ceded if the bill becomes a law and its provisions are accepted by all the States and Territories therein named will amount to 558,141,374 acres, less whatever number of acres may have been taken up since the estimate in the report of the Commissioner, dated September 23, 1891, and deducting also the mineral lands, which, for the reasons before stated, can not be differentiated nor their extent determined, and are distributed as follows:

	Acres.
Arizona	55,061,005
California	52,299,499
Colorado	42,167,080
Idaho	33,781,851
Kansas	799,078
Montana	74,872,769
Nebraska	11,490,436
New Mexico	54,893,679
Nevada	53,689,524
North Dakota	16,135,440
Oklahoma	3,502,406
Oregon	39,220,151
South Dakota	14,085,394
Utah	35,428,987
Washington	20,401,691
Wyoming	50,842,434

It is deemed unnecessary to attempt any further analysis of the bill at this time. It is here subjoined for examination in connection with this report.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That, subject to all rights, inchoate or perfected thereto, all the lands of whatever nature or description and rights thereto, including water rights, now belonging or appertaining to the United States, lying and being situated in the States of Nebraska, Nevada, South Dakota, North Dakota, Montana, Washington, Oregon, Wyoming, Idaho, Colorado, Kansas, and California, and in the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, Oklahoma, and Utah, severally, with full and complete jurisdiction thereover, be, and are hereby, granted, ceded, and confirmed to said several States and Territories, the grant to each of said States and Territories to be of the lands contained within its present boundaries and territorial limits.

"And the President of the United States shall issue letters patent for the same to the said several States and Territories in this section designated whenever and as any of said States and Territories shall by an act of its legislature accept the disposition of the lands as herein provided, within the time hereinafter specified. This act shall in no manner affect any of the lands held by the United States for parks, naval, military, or other public purposes, nor any Indian lands, nor lands held in trust for or for use by Indians, nor mineral lands, nor shall it apply in any manner to the Territory of Alaska.

"SEC. 2. That the governors of the Territories of Utah, Arizona, Oklahoma, and New Mexico shall, within a reasonable time after the passage of this act, call special sessions, if need be, of their several legislatures, to take into consideration and pass upon the provisions of this act and the questions herein submitted to them, and may from time to time call such other sessions of their respective legislatures as may be rendered necessary; and the benefits of this act shall not accrue to any State or Territory which shall not have accepted the provisions thereof within four years from its approval.

"SEC. 3. That as soon as practicable after the issuance of letters patent to any State or Territory herein mentioned, for the lands therein situate, and from time to time thereafter as occasion may require, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, at the expense of the United States, to cause to be delivered to the proper authorities of such State or Territory all maps, records, books, and papers, or certified copies thereof in case it may be necessary to retain the originals in the General Land Office, which may be necessary to such State or Territory for the proper control, administration, and disposition of such lands.

"SEC. 4. That no State or Territory accepting the cession of lands as herein provided shall in any case sell, lease, or dispose of said lands in greater quantity than 160 acres to any one person, corporation, or association, nor shall any such State or Territory in any manner impair or abridge the homestead privileges now granted to soldiers and sailors under the land laws of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAWNEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill S. 3057 and had come to no resolution thereon.

UINTAH RESERVATION, UTAH.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 238.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, instructed and directed to transmit to the House of Representatives the results of the recent surveys and examinations of the agricultural lands and water resources of the Uintah Indian Reservation in Utah.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

GNADENHUTTEN SPECIAL SCHOOL DISTRICT.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11742) granting certain lots in Gnadenhutten, Ohio, to Gnadenhutten special school district.

Be it enacted, etc., That lots 68 and 69 in the town of Gnadenhutten, Ohio, are hereby granted in fee simple to the Gnadenhutten special school district of Gnadenhutten, Tuscarawas County, Ohio.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read as follows:

In line 4 strike out the words "granted in fee simple" and insert the word "quitclaimed;" and in line 6, after the word "Ohio," insert the words "subject to the disposition and control of the board of education of said district."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to inquire of the gentleman, reserving the right to object, what there is about the disposition of this land?

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Speaker, I call this bill up for my colleague [Mr. CASSINGHAM], who is absent, and the facts are these; In 1824 the General Government ceded to the village of Gnadenhutten, in Ohio, two lots to be used for school purposes. They immediately built a schoolhouse on these lots. They were used until 1896, when the houses became too small and the space too limited for the uses of the village, and they had to buy a larger space of ground and build another school. The question is whether or not full title was ceded to the village when the land was ceded; and now they want this bill placing the equity of the Government in the special school district, so that they can sell the land.

Mr. PAYNE. This is to confirm the title.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Was there any limitation in the original grant?

Mr. SNOOK. It was for school purposes. They want it for a public school.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendments offered by the committee.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SNOOK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 8735) to apply a portion of proceeds of sale of public lands to the endowment of schools or departments of mining and metallurgy, etc., and the accompanying report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks for the reprint of a bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SOLOMON P. BROCKWAY.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call up a conference report.

Mr. DALZELL. Has it been printed formerly?

Mr. GIBSON. It was printed several days ago.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10545) granting an increase of pension to Solomon P. Brockway, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed by the Senate insert "twenty-four;" and the Senate agree to the same.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
A. B. DARRAGH,
Managers on the part of the House.
P. J. McCUMBER,
JOSEPH SIMON,
JAS. P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement was read, as follows:

Statement of House conferees to accompany conference report on H. R. 10545.

The House fixed the rate of the pension at $30 per month. The Senate reduced this rate to $20 per month. The conference report fixes the rate at $24 per month.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
A. B. DARRAGH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

GEORGE W. BARRY.

Mr. GIBSON. I present another conference report and ask that the statement only be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the reading of the report be omitted and that the statement be read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The bill (H. R. 9544) granting an increase of pension to George W. Barry passed the House at $20. The Senate amended the same by striking out $20 and inserting $16.

The result of the conference is that the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agrees to the same, leaving the bill as it passed the Senate.

C. A. SULLOWAY,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
RUD. KLEBERG,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

ALLEGED ILL TREATMENT OF AMERICANS IN ECUADOR.

Mr. MASON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a short article showing the illegal imprisonment of American citizens in Ecuador. I ask that it be printed, omitting the head lines. It is very short and will make less than a column.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[By Jos. Ohl.]

WASHINGTON, June 3, 1902.

Damages aggregating many thousands of dollars are to be claimed of the Government of Ecuador for the illegal imprisonment and the ill treatment in many other respects of citizens of the United States.

Former United States Senator Thurston, of Nebraska, and former Congressman John S. Wise, of New York, represent several of the claimants, and the allegations upon which these claims are based reveal a state of affairs in the Republic on the west coast of South America which may call for strenuous action by the United States Government.

American citizens have, it is alleged, been thrown into the filthy jails of the Republic on charges of the most trivial nature; have been held under the disgraceful peon law at the will of petty magistrates from whose action there is no appeal; have had their lives jeopardized and their health broken—the sole purpose, apparently, being to force from them the payment of blackmail.

One man has been under treatment at the Providence Hospital in this city, his constitution a wreck, his chances for life apparently small, because he was cast into one of the jails of Ecuador and was given no opportunity for a hearing on his case and no chance to communicate with the American authorities. Several other well-known Americans who have suffered at the hands of the Ecuadorian officials are now in this country and have placed their cases in the hands of the attorneys mentioned, in the hope that by demanding redress through the officials of this Government the Ecuadorian Government may be forced to respect the rights of Americans m the future.

Up to 1898 there were but few Americans in the country, but in that year an Anglo-Saxon Company closed a contract with the Government of Ecuador to extend the railroad—then in operation from Guayaquil to Chimbo, a distance of 55 miles—from Chimbo to Quito, the capital, a distance of about 250 miles. The enterprise involved the expenditure of millions and the employment of thousands of men. The president of the company, the general manager, and nearly all the officers and contractors are Americans.

Labor was difficult to obtain, and the J. P. McDonald Company, which contracted with the syndicate to build the road, imported from 4,000 to 6,000 Jamaicans and a few hundred Porto Ricans. As is generally the case in works of this kind, there was more or less friction and there were controversies among the Americans themselves and between the Americans and the natives.

Americans who are familiar with conditions in that country charge that a more ignorant, tyrannical, and corrupt set of rascals could not possibly be found than the police officials, or many of them. There have been many complaints of outrages committed by these officials upon Americans, but so far no redress has been obtained except that in one or two instances the magistrates have been dismissed. Most of the Americans have, from motives of policy, endured these wrongs in silence, but now several of them propose to seek compensation for their sufferings.

One of these is John W. Conner, a citizen of Knoxville, Tenn., and a man of prominence. He was a delegate to both of the national conventions which nominated Mr. McKinley. At one time he held a good Government position in Porto Rico, but he resigned that to take a railroad contract under the McDonald Company. A dispute with some of the native transporters of merchandise, which is carried over the mountains in Ecuador on the backs of mules and Indians, resulted in his being arrested by the police magistrate of Alausi and thrown into a filthy jail without even the formality of a trial. Mr. Conner's description of these jails shows them to be pest holes of filth and disease beyond anything that the people of the United States can imagine. As the amount involved was small, and as Conner was willing to submit to almost anything rather than incur the risk of disease in that pest hole, he paid what was demanded and was released after a short incarceration. He is now suing for illegal imprisonment.

Mr. M. J. Bolan is a native of Springfield, Ohio, a railroad contractor and a gentleman who enjoys the respect and esteem of those who know him. Something of his troubles has become known through the cabled reports from Guayaquil, and the vigorous action of the late consul-general, Mr. De Leon, in forcing the authorities to release him from jail. This was only accomplished, however, after he had been illegally imprisoned for nearly four days. Bolan was a foreman, or camp boss, for one of the subcontractors, Mr. Shea. Two natives, who claimed that Shea owed them money for procuring peons to work on the road, entered into a conspiracy with a police magistrate of Alausi named Merchan to force Bolan to pay the money claimed or to extort it from the railroad company. Early in December this magistrate had Bolan thrown into jail on a charge of refusing to pay the sums claimed by his coconspiraters. Bolan claimed that he was merely an employee of Mr. Shea, which was a fact, and it was shown that Mr. Shea had made no contract of the kind claimed.

Nevertheless Bolan was thrown into jail on the judgment of Magistrate Merchan, who held that he owed the two natives 2,400 sucres, the sucre being nearly 50 cents American. He was released on bail after his first arrest, but was later taken by a squad of soldiers and cast in jail under the order of the magistrate that he stay there until the sum was paid. The magistrate, under the law, did not have jurisdiction in cases involving more than 160 sucres, but that made no difference in the result. It seems that the magistrates, who are usually men of no standing or qualification for a judicial office, can not be appealed from. Under the so-called peon law their power is absolute. Even the president of the Republic can not pardon one of their victims. He must pay the amount adjudged against him or submit to perpetual sentence in one of the vile prisons.

Bolan was finally permitted to remain at liberty to employ a lawyer or consult with the company. He went to Victoria and appealed to the American consul-general. Mr. Perry Allen, an American lawyer now in Ecuador, but a resident of Washington, was engaged to represent him. Bolan went to Guayaquil and there was rearrested and thrown into jail. After he had been imprisoned seventy-seven hours his release was effected by Consul-General De Leon. A third, fourth, and fifth attempt was made to arrest him and take him to Alausi in chains, but De Leon refused to give him up. It was only after the consul-general had threatened to cable for a war ship that the authorities permitted Bolan to leave the country.

It was for his strenuous action in this case that the Ecuador authorities declared De Leon persona non grata. This seems to be a favorite method resorted to by some of the South American republics to get rid of a diplomatic representative of another government who insists in securing protection for American citizens. Bolan suffered seriously, both in pocket and in health, by the action of the Ecuadorian officials, and says that but for Consul General De Leon he might have died in jail. He was ill for two weeks or more with fever while refugeeing at the consulate.

A number of other outrages were from time to time perpetrated upon Americans. An explosion occurred at one point of the work on the railroad and a workman was killed. The American in charge, a Mr. Regan, was arrested and taken to prison in Chimbo with a rope around his neck. On his arrival, after a 25-mile tramp through mud knee deep, he was put in stocks formed of heavy timbers and iron bars. He was kept in prison several days, was denied a hearing, but was finally released without even a charge having been brought against him.

D. C. Stapleton, vice-president and general manager of a mining company, who is a friend of Speaker HENDERSON, was thrown into jail by the judge, a barefoot, half-naked negro, who told him there was no charge against him, but that the friends of the judge, other negroes and half-breeds, clamored for his imprisonment. He was kept in the unspeakably foul jail one night and part of the following day, the jail being surrounded by a howling mob crying out, "Kill the Gringo." Their animosity was due to Stapleton's having refused to have certain business dealings with them. He was finally released without trial.

Some idea of life in Ecuador can be gathered from the experience of the wife of the Spanish minister. She is an Italian lady and a devout member of the Catholic Church. After being out for a walk or a ride, she went into a church at Quito with her hat on. In Italy ladies enter churches with their hats on, but in Quito they do not. Wholly unaware of this edict of custom, she went into the church wearing her hat. A fanatical woman rushed up to her, struck her a severe blow in the face, tore her hat from her head, the hat pin inflicting a deep wound. The incident naturally created a great sensation, but the assailant of the minister's wife escaped discovery. Not long ago the lives of the American missionaries were threatened by a mob. General Alfaro, then president, furnished them a guard and put down the demonstration by threatening the archbishop that he would be held responsible if any harm accrued to the persons or property of the missionaries.

Of all the cases of Americans, that of Leonard Selser presents the best evidence of the terrible results following incarceration in the jail of Ecuador. That they are pest holes of indescribable filth and loathsome disease seems to be clearly demonstrated by his experience.

Selser is a native of Minnesota. He and two companions became involved in a difficulty with a citizen in which they got the better of it. All, it seems, had been drinking some. They were pursued by the police and beaten and mangled in a most shocking manner. Selser received three machete cuts over his head. In self-defense he shot and mortally wounded one of his assailants. He was thrown into jail, where he was insensible over twelve hours. Despite his wounds and desperate condition physically, he was kept in chains, hand and foot, eighteen days and then taken to Guayaquil, where he was imprisoned nearly ten months without preliminary trial. A prominent attorney of Ecuador, a native of the country, furnishes this description of the jail in which Selser was confined for ten months without being given the preliminary hearing guaranteed by the code:

"Within each cell there are barrels of excrement; the prisoner is never allowed to breathe fresh air in the courtyard, and never knows what a bath is. In the poisoned air of a damp cell and in an exasperating climate like that of this city, the most robust person may contract a mortal disease after thirty days' confinement. A judge who wants to assassinate an accused has only to delay the procedure and extend it indefinitely or eternally."

Selser was not allowed to communicate with the American officials, and it was not for about ten months after his arrest that the consul-general learned of his plight. By that time his condition was so pitiful and the representations of the consul-general were so strenuous that the officials became scared and allowed Selser to go aboard the cruiser Philadelphia, which had been sent to Ecuador to investigate the complaints of Mr. De Leon. The man was taken on the Philadelphia as far as Panama, and, by the aid of the sailors on that ship, who raised a purse for him, he got to New York. He is now a physical wreck. He went into prison a robust man: at Panama he weighed only 112 pounds, and he is now in a very feeble condition, from which he may never recover.

The persecutions inflicted upon Americans have, in a number of cases, been under the guise of the peon law, which is denounced by Americans as one of the most disgraceful that stains the statutes of any nation. While technically this law can not apply to cases of alleged indebtedness of foreigners, the petty magistrates seem to have arbitrarily so applied it. That was done in the Bolan case and in several others.

This peon law was enacted when slavery was nominally abolished to give the landowners absolute control of the bodies and, it would seem, the souls of the laborers, relieving them of all the responsibility that ownership of slaves would involve, but at the same time giving them the profit and advantage to be derived from the labor of the serfs so long as they are able-bodied.

It is asserted that Southern slavery, in its worst form, under the most brutal overseer, was a boon and blessing compared to this peonage system in Ecuador.

It is under this peon law that Bolan and other prominent Americans have been cast into the jails by magistrates from whose decisions there is no appeal under the law of Ecuador, no matter how corrupt the magistrate may be or how shocking to justice is his decision.

I desire to state in this connection that if the committee should be raised, as proposed by the resolution, I wish it understood that I could not serve on the committee, even if I were appointed. I have other engagements for the summer, and therefore I am to be relieved from the suspicion of any effort on my part to get up a committee for the purpose of a summer outing. I ask that the resolution be read and referred.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate, inquire into, and ascertain the general condition of the islands of Hawaii, the administration of the affairs thereof, the area, condition, quality, and value of the public lands, the leasing, selling, or disposing thereof, and to make such recommendations as may be deemed necessary; to investigate and ascertain the area, condition, quality, and value of the crown lands, the rents, issues, or other revenues or proceeds received therefrom since January 17, 1893; whether or not the former queen of said islands now possesses any legal or equitable right, title, or interest in or to the same; the granting of franchises or other privileges, the question of immigration, the condition of labor therein, and to inquire into and report upon all other necessary matters pertaining to the executive, legislative, judicial, educational, tax, school, financial, and other systems thereof.

Mr. MITCHELL. In what respect?

Mr. MITCHELL. I accept that modification.

Mr. HOAR. I want to have that authority included.

Mr. MITCHELL. I simply desire to bring the whole matter to the attention of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be modified as follows——

Mr. MITCHELL. I accept the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope it will appear in the RECORD as accepted by the author of the resolution, and not passed upon by the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly; because I desire to have the whole matter come before the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am willing to have it come in as part of the inquiry proposed without having been adopted as an amendment in the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As modified by the Senator from Oregon, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I do not know what the practice is in such matters. The resolution will go, I suppose, to the committee, and then after the committee shall have acted it would have to go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the committee act favorably.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If favorably acted upon it would then go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There has been so much confusion in the Chamber that I have not been able to understand what the resolution is. I wish the first part of it might be reread.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read as modified.

The Secretary proceeded to read the resolution, and read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate, inquire into, and ascertain the general condition of the islands of Hawaii——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is there a provision in the resolution that they are to visit the islands?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I hope the committee will not report back any such resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has gone to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not the time now to discuss it.

REBECCA J. TAYLOR.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I desire to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution introduced by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] in regard to Miss Taylor was referred on yesterday to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. The Senator from Tennessee went away day before yesterday, and asked me to request the Senate that the resolution retain its place upon the table. I was called out of the Chamber and was not present at the time it was referred, and I ask now that the vote may be reconsidered so that it may be placed on the table and that the Senator from Tennessee may hereafter have an opportunity to make some remarks on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the vote by which the resolution in relation to a Miss Taylor, offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. BERRY. I ask that the resolution lie upon the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas further asks that the resolution lie upon the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HOAR. What resolution is it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A resolution relating to the discharge of a Miss Taylor from the Government service.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have no objection to that course. If the Senator calls it up, I shall be very glad to be present, and if I am absent I hope some of the pages will notify me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered, as requested by the Senator from Arkansas.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.
